than it is profitable for anyone to be. It has put him at a long remove from his patron's purse, taste and comradeship. It has pretty well done away with the old citizenship of the artist, with the mental coöperation between himself and his neighbors. City life particularly has become hard for him. To live, he must charge prices that sadly limit his public, or he must live otherwise than by his art, in poverty or subsidized dilettantism. It is wholesome for the artist neither to live in eccentric Bohemias nor yet to become the financial rival of the neurologist.

Mr. Tiffany has felt that it is best that some artists should live out of the city in the companionship of their own kind, and in touch with beautiful things. He intends, we understand, not wholly to support, but to aid, his guests. He will do for a group of artists what many are beginning to do for themselves. The Macdowell Colony at Peterboro, New Hampshire, represents an organized form of a similar endeavor, and, apart from the innumerable summer colonies of artists, the year-round settlements at Taos and New Hope express the same tendency. Mr. Tiffany's establishment will have the considerable advantage of being in the country yet near the city. There will be little temptation for the artist to burrow too exclusively within the bounds of his own idiosyncrasy. The modern artist must feel the pulse of his own time, and without being shattered by its mighty and confused throbbing. That is his dilemma. Such a haven as Mr. Tiffany is to provide should help many an artist to maintain a creative serenity without losing the sense of the tumultuous environing sea.

The Threatened Coal Strike

THE threatened strike among the bituminous coal miners of the United States is based on an entirely new principle of economics—an unsound principle that cannot be applied to any industry, or in any country, which hopes to advance or even to hold its own. This principle was given expression in the testimony of Captain Tetlow, statistician for the United Mine Workers of America, before the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, which, under the direction of Senator Frelinghuysen as chairman, has been conducting an investigation of the coal situation. It is, in effect, that industry, and the coal-mining industry in particular, must furnish steady employment at all times for the men engaged in it. When, as is admittedly the case in the present situation, the number of men on the payrolls exceeds the number necessary to work the mines steadily for 300 days in the year, or is more than is required to produce all the coal needed for this country and for export, the number of working hours must be reduced so that each man shall be retained on the payrolls, and without any reduction in his monthly or yearly earnings.

The present demand for a six-hour day and five days a week is predicated upon the claim that because of broken time, due chiefly in the early part of the year to a lessened demand for coal, and for the last few months to a shortage of railway cars, the miners have been able to average only about that amount of working time and in that time they have produced all the coal which the market could absorb or for which the railroads would supply the cars and the motive power.

It is true that the need for and the production of bituminous coal this year are much below what they were in 1917 or 1918. The production up to October 1, this year is something more than 100,000,000 tons below what it was for the same period last year, and consequently the miner has made fewer working hours and less total earnings than he did during the period of the war; but he has not had more broken time in 1919 than in normal years preceding the war and he has had the benefit of the increased wages to offset the increased cost of living equal to those of wage earners in most other lines of employment. The miner's vocation is not seasonal in its character, like that of the carpenter, the brick-layer, or the stone-mason, and yet his average working time in 1916 was 230 days, in 1915, 203 days, in 1914, 195 days, in 1913, 232 days, and in 1912, 223 days. In a period of twenty-five years preceding the war the largest number of working days averaged by the bituminous mine workers was 234 days, made in 1899, 1900, and 1907. Under the abnormal conditions produced by the war, the average working time in the bituminous coal mines was 243 days.

Coupled with the demand for the six-hour day, five days in the week, is that for a 60 per cent. advance in wages. The reason for this demand lies, of course, in the fact that, with 60 per cent. added to a 30-hour week, the earnings would be the same as those for a 48-hour week, and a little more than for the 44-hour week, which is rather more general, for in most districts Saturday is a half holiday. It is quite evident, therefore, that it is not because of dissatisfaction with present earnings that the demands are made, but in order that the same results may be accomplished in the way of earnings with 75 per cent. of the labor put into the winning of them.

It is inconceivable that such extraordinary and unreasonable demands should be granted. They would increase the cost to the consumer certainly as much as $2.00, and possibly as much as $2.50 a ton, and this in turn would naturally result in decreased demand for coal. Domestic consumers would exercise greater economy in its use, while railroads and other large consumers would turn wherever possible to fuel oil, a commodity which is already making serious inroads into the markets for coal.

With the decreased consumption of coal and further broken time for the miner, Captain Tetlow's proposal carried to its logical conclusion would necessitate the establishment of, say, a 20-hour week (four hours a day for five days), and another advance of 50 per cent., and so on, ad infinitum.

The sinister aspect of the present situation, and the actual basis of the threatened strike, as set forth in the declaration of the miners at Cleveland, is apparently a determination to force the nationalization of the coal-mining industry. Advantage is taken of the present season of the year on the part of one party to a tripartite agreement (the other parties being the operators and the Federal Government) to abrogate that agreement without the consent of the other parties, the agreement which was made in Washington being that the existing wage scale should be effective during the continuance of the war or until March 31, 1920. The action of the United Mine Workers in thus re-pudding their agreement at a time when they may believe they have the people and the Government by the throat, gives color to the suspicion, voiced in some circles, that they have been influenced by, and are acting in collusion with, representatives of the railroad brotherhoods in an effort to secure control of the transportation and the coal-mining industries upon the plan proposed by Glenn E. Plumb.

It is known that advocates of the Plumb plan are at the present time spreading propaganda through the coal-mining region. There is a possibility, if not a probability, in the view of many who are concerned about the present situation, that the railroad brotherhoods will join issue with the miners in any walkout that gives promise of success and thus add to the paralyzing effect, not only on the transportation facilities, but on all industries, and to untold suffering on the part of the people.

An unfortunate phase of the situation is that the Railroad Administration itself cannot escape responsibility for a part of the present difficulty, for, owing to differences between the coal companies and the Railroad Administration as to the prices the railroads should pay for their fuel, the transportation companies have not contracted for their winter supplies to be delivered in advance, but have been buying almost entirely for immediate requirements; they find themselves at this critical juncture with reserve supplies at a dangerously low level. This policy of the Railroad Administration was largely responsible for the reports of "no market" which were given as the chief reason for reduced production in the early months of the coal year and which produced in large part the broken time complained of by the miners.

The railroad companies were not the only culprits in this regard, however, for large industrial consumers followed, to a considerable extent, the same policy; they have but themselves to blame for any present shortage in their fuel supplies, and they must share the responsibility for a demand of a 6-hour day. It would seem that the experience of 1917 should have proved a lesson on the wisdom of forehandedness, but, if it was, it has been soon forgotten.

During the last few months the complaints of the bituminous coal-mine operators have been directed at the Railroad Administration for failure to provide the necessary cars with which even to keep the mines and miners steadily employed, and which might enable them to make up the deficiency caused by the procrastination of the earlier months. The hardships which the strike will produce upon industry dependent upon coal must prove more serious than upon transportation, for, in the very nature of things at such a time, railroads become preferred customers and may in addition exercise their powers of confiscation of any or all coal for locomotive use. Suffering among the domestic consumers who have also failed to provide against the rigors of winter by laying in their supplies in advance (and this particularly affects the poorer classes) must necessarily follow. But aside from the mere heating of the homes, the supply of gas for domestic purposes, now chiefly used for cooking, is largely dependent upon a continuous supply of soft coal. The shortage of bituminous coal would naturally create an unusual demand for hard coal, and, although the anthracite miners are pledged by their agreement of September 29 to remain at work until March 31, 1920, the mines are unable to produce anything like enough coal to make good the deficiency.

The anthracite miners have been much more wisely led than have their brothers in the bituminous fields. Without any display of heroics or blare of trumpets the Anthracite Mine Workers' Organization requested that the supplemental agreement of November 15, 1918, which provided certain wage increases as war bonuses, and which was to "remain in effect until the declaration of peace or until March 31, 1920, in case peace is not declared before that date," should be extended until March 31, 1920, the date upon which the present basic wage agreement made on May 5, 1916, terminates. In response to this request the representatives of the anthracite operators and the anthracite miners met in Philadelphia on September 29, and continued the agreement. This action called forth a decided expression of approval from Senator Frelinghuysen on the floor of the Senate, in the same speech in which he condemned the leaders of the bituminous miners for their unreasonable demands and for their high-handed action in seeking to compel acceptance of their terms "without amendment," with the penalty, as an alternative, of a nation-wide coal strike with all the paralysis of transportation and industry, and of the suffering among the people that such action would entail.

It does not seem possible that John L. Lewis, acting president of the United Mine Workers, and his lieutenants will run the risk of bringing this organization under the wrath of public opinion by carrying their threat to the extreme. The principal factor in the successful conduct of a strike which materially affects the people is the sympathy of the people in the cause for which the strike is called. In the present case public sympathy is far removed from the workers in the bituminous coal mines. The public knows that the demands are out of reason, and not an inconsiderable part of that public realizes that the miners' leaders are playing a hold-up game. Another part believes that the present attitude of the mine workers is one of bluff and bluster and that, brought face to face with determination on the part of the operators, backed by outraged and indignant public opinion, the miners will accept the proffered olive branch and agree to a maintenance of the status quo until March 31, 1920, as the workers in the anthracite region have already seen their way to do.

The writer is inclined to agree with the editor of the American Coal Journal, who in a recent review of the situation stated that personally he did not believe there would be a strike, although every indication pointed that way. With him, the writer is sanguine that in the end good sense will prevail; that, though the mines may be shut down for a while in order that the leaders may save their faces, a compromise will be effected before actual suffering begins, and that bituminous coal will be mined pretty steadily during the coming winter and not on a basis of six hours a day, five days in the week.

EDWARD W. PARKER

The Hungarian Tangle

FOR over a thousand years Hungary has existed as a national entity. Armies have swept across the country; the border states have changed their boundaries, but the Hungarian boundaries have remained. The reason of this is geographical. With its rivers, its plains, its mountains, Hungary was complete and self-sustaining. Socially, the composition of the state was a curious survival of feudal times, picturesque perhaps, but decidedly unpleasant for all except members of the ruling class. The great nobles dominated Hungary. They were warriors, autocrats, impervious to modern social ideas. None but members of this class had any influence in the Government. Below the nobles existed a very restricted middle class, including successful men in the commercial field, but this class never exerted any important influence on the country. The great mass of people were and are peasants, without much education and with little ambition except to own land. The only supporters of the late unlamented Bolshevik régime were parts of the laboring classes in the cities and the large towns.

Half of the inhabitants of Hungary are of alien race and this has made thoughtless people accuse the Magyars of conquering and then oppressing the inhabitants of foreign states. That aliens were oppressed is true, but they came to Hungary of their own free will and this colonization has given a queer twist to the problem of self-determination. If large numbers of Mexicans crowded into Texas, settled there, multiplied, and finally outnumbered the native Americans, exactly how long would it be before the United States would be compelled to cede Texas to Mexico on the plea of self-determination? The problem of Transylvania is precisely the same. The Rumanians settled there, multiplied, grew to outnumber the Magyars. Now Hungary must cede that portion of its territory to Rumania. From the Hungarian point of view the same situation exists, of course, with regard to the lands ceded to Czechoslovakia, Austria, and Jugoslavia. One wonders whether the millions of Magyars in the ceded countries will be less restless than were the Rumanians and Czechs and Austrians and Slovenes in Hungarian territory. The outlook for peace is not hopeful. The Magyars point out, also, that in the distribution of their territory ethnological reasons were given as decisive, but that similar reasons did not hold in other distributions of territory. German Bohemia, for example, was given to Czechoslovakia for economic and geographical reasons, although the inhabitants of the territory were overwhelmingly German-speaking. In Transylvania equally vital geographical and economic arguments were cast into the discard because slightly more than fifty per cent. of the population were Rumanians. In the Tyrol both economic and ethnological arguments were ignored in order to give Italy a better military frontier. "A peace of violence," say the Magyars, "is no less a peace of violence because of noble-sounding explanations. Transylvania is given to Rumania because a slight majority of the people are Rumanian-speaking; Pressburg, overwhelmingly Magyar, is given to Czechoslovakia because economically that state needs the city on the Danube; West Hungary is allotted to Austria because Vienna needs it as a market garden. Not a single reason for the assignment of any particular scrap of territory seems ever to apply to Hungary."

Whether or not there is justice in this claim is a matter for history to decide. It certainly would have appeared more straightforward if the Peace Conference had said quite simply: "You Magyars have proved yourselves, during centuries, aliens under your control. For this reason we intend so to readjust your boundaries that these groups shall have an opportunity of normal development in accord with their national characteristics." Such a frank statement could hardly have been more irritating to the Hungarians and would have saved the Peace Conference many difficult explanations. It would also have made impossible any Hungarian appeal to world sympathy, because the whole world knows what Magyar rule, at least until recent years, has meant.

What the world wants is peace, and no sentimental consideration for the newly-created nations or blind confidence in the omniscience of the hordes of technical advisers to the Peace Conference ought to prevent consideration of the problem as to whether the present "settlement" of questions in the Danube regions and present events there are likely to lead toward peace.

The outstanding fact in Hungary today is the Rumanian occupation. A concise résumé of what has occurred since the Armistice is necessary to understand this situation. Hungary signed the Armistice terms and apparently in good faith. A government under Count Karolyi was formed and continued for some months, in spite of the fact that the boundaries laid down by the Armistice were repeatedly violated by Rumanians, Czechs, and Serbs, because Karolyi was supposed to be on good terms with the Entente and to be more likely than any other to save some semblance of the ancient state. The Entente considered, promised, did nothing to restrain the rapacity of its little mid-European Allies, and in the final crisis Karolyi, discredited, turned the Government over to the Bolshevists. Bela Kun ignored the terms of the Armistice as completely as his neighbors had ignored it, proceeded to build up a Red army, and made a very successful raid in Slovakia. The Peace Conference ordered him out. He withdrew his armies and appeared to be concentrating them on the Rumanian frontier—a frontier, it may be said, that was already many miles west of the line prescribed. Exactly what happened at this point can not be determined. Bela Kun actually attacked the Rumanians on July 20, but his army was quickly repulsed. Whether he could have attacked again had he wished, is not known. His army had been recruited to save the state. After it was formed the Bolshevists stopped preaching nationalism and talked only Bolshevik principles. These interested the majority of the army not at all and, after the retreat from Slovakia, desertions occurred by the thousands. Such an army could hardly have been considered a serious menace to Rumania, but, on the ground that it was planning further attacks, the Rumanians prepared to advance. Things happened with bewildering rapidity. The Bolshevik Government fell and was succeeded by a more moderate but still radical Socialist Government. The Rumanians started toward Budapest. If, at this critical moment, Paris had shown determination and resource, the situation might have been saved, but instead the Peace Conference only warned the new Government to carry out the Armistice terms—already violated by all concerned—and defined again the frontier lines beyond which Hungarian troops might not advance. In the east this line was already imaginary, for the Rumanians had long since crossed it in their hot-foot advance on Budapest. They took the city, almost without opposition, and on August 6, by a bloodless coup d'état, the Archduke Joseph seized the reigns of government.

In any discussion of this illegal Rumanian invasion it would be unfair to Rumania not to admit, at the outset, that the Rumanian Government probably had as little confidence in the ability of the Peace Conference to restrain the Hungarians as successive Hungarian Governments had in the promises of the same Conference to restrain the land hunger of its Allies. Rumania had watched the disorders in Hungary for months and found conditions in August hardly less chaotic than in March. Rumania saw little hope of recovering the supplies carried off by Germans, Austrians, and Hungarians after the seizure of Bucharest during the war. Here was an opportunity, Hungary being prostrate, to get redress, and to atone for the ignominy of the German-Hungarian entry into Bucharest by a Rumanian entrance into Budapest. However regrettable, such considerations were so human as to be almost legitimate. But beyond the initial excuse there is nothing to be said for Rumania. The invasion was the most flagrant violation of the Armistice that had occurred; although practically unopposed, it was characterized by a brutality that recalls the German invasion of Belgium and northern France. Looting and murder were the order of the day and the people dared not retaliate, since the Rumanian Commander had stated that for any Rumanian soldier killed five Hungarians would be executed.

But if little can be said for the Rumanian invasion, no excuse whatever can be made for the occupation. The Rumanians have flouted the Allied Mission in Budapest; they have laughed at the Peace Conference in Paris, justifying all they have done with true Oriental diplomacy. What these things are forms the most recent chapter of human brutality. The Rumanians destroyed the railway to Vienna; they seized all the food they could find; they stripped machinery from the factories, throwing thousands out of employment; they requisitioned all livestock; they carried off all medicines and surgical dressings from the hospitals in Budapest, leaving the patients in a deplorable condition; they took all the shoes from the orphanages, so that the children will have to go barefoot during the coming winter—all these things on the ground of "military necessity" or because "they had been stolen from Rumania." They seized practically all the rolling stock of the country. It is known that up to September 18, 759 locomotives and 18,495 cars had crossed the Tisza River en route to Rumania. Since that time they have taken so many cars "for troop movements" that Hungary has left only 4,500 cars for some 60,000 kilometers of line—and it takes 4,000 cars daily to feed Budapest alone! These cars have not gone away empty. Nearly 4,000 contained railroad and war material and oil tanks; 500 more were filled with leather; 2,461 were sealed so that the character of the loot they contained could not be determined. These cars were all "stolen from Rumania, who is only taking back her own;" yet large numbers are cars belonging to the railroads of Austria, Alsace, Czechoslovakia, Italy, and Jugoslavia. Of course, Rumania has promised to furnish the Peace Conference with a list of all requisitions and to abide by its decisions, but what this list will contain and how much will ever be recovered is quite another matter. Apparently, the Rumanians intend to remain in Hungary until after the harvest, since Hungarian corn would be appreciated in Bucharest. In the meantime, Hungary itself has been reduced to a state of abject misery, with no food, without materials, without money, without work, without hope.

All this is the material side of the picture. On the moral and political side it is no better. The Government of the Archduke Joseph fell almost immediately because the Allies, for once, took a firm stand. The weak Friedrich Government that succeeded seems, strangely enough, to have popular approval and confidence, but it has not been recognized for fear that it may be "reactionary," and Rumania is, therefore, able to justify its occupation on the ground that Hungary is enemy territory. Rumania offered terms to Hungary as soon as Budapest fell; terms involving extensive territorial cessions, close economic union, and military alliance. So far, the Friedrich Government has refused to accept these terms and for that reason is hated by the Rumanians. But as Paris continues to send futile remonstrances to Rumania and as Hungary falls into darker misery, the opinion is growing that alliance with Rumania might be the wiser choice between two evils. Perhaps the Magyars who now favor this alliance understand the real Rumanian plan of forming a greater Rumania which shall replace the Hapsburg Empire and in which they will occupy the dominant position. One thing is certain, Hungary will not remain long a vassal of the nation which it despises most among all nations.

The Rumanians are not only imposing their independent terms on the Hungarian Government. They are also taking effective measures to prevent either the continuance of the present Government or the establishment of a more stable government when the time for them to retire finally comes. Anarchy will spring out of the misery in Budapest as soon as the Rumanian soldiery withdraws, unless there is an efficient Hungarian police. But the Rumanians thwart every effort to establish such a force. They agree to the principle and then make its realization impossible. This, of course, is a part of their whole plan to force acceptance of their terms on Hungary. If Bolshevism again gains control, the Rumanians expect to come into Hungary again, this time at the request of the Allies, and they are sure that a second occupation will be permanent.

Unfortunately, the Rumanians do not even confine their requisitions and their methods of coercion to those parts of Hungary which will remain Hungarian. The part of Transylvania which is to be assigned to Rumania groans under the exactions of swarms of petty officials from Bucharest; thousands who will not immediately take the oath of allegiance are being deported after all their property has been confiscated; even the Rumanian inhabitants of the district, people of higher grade than the Rumanians from Rumania proper, are crying out against the tactics of their countrymen. In Bessarabia the people are praying for relief from the Rumanian locusts which are stripping the country bare, carrying off even the relief food sent from America. If such action is indicative of Rumanian plans for the future, it is no wonder that the Government refused to sign the Austrian Peace Treaty because of its provisions for the protection of minorities.

Peace is the ideal toward which the world is straining—peace in southeastern Europe as well as in western Europe and the Americas. In Hungary, war with all its attendant horrors actually exists, and it is not a purifying war but one which will make recrudescence of wars between Hungary and Rumania almost certain for years to come. Czechoslovakia, in the meanwhile, looks on in disgust, not for altruistic reasons but because she can have no share in the plunder. Yugoslavia may have a certain sympathy for Hungary, but if so it is because she fears for herself. The Italians support Rumania and would like nothing better than to see her dominant in Hungary as a menace on the northern border of Serbia. A few months ago Italy supported Bela Kun for the same reason. Bulgaria is sullen and is plotting revenge. All this looks like war, like a transfer of Balkan problems and animosities toward Central Europe. But these are matters for the future. The immediate issue, and one that cannot much longer be avoided, is the settlement of the intolerable situation in Hungary.

Interpreting the Treaty

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Can we use "reservations" in our ratification of the treaty without, in logic at least, needing their acceptance by the other signatories? Isn't interpretation the only safe term so far proposed?

Would it not be perfectly practical to say: We interpret Article X to leave any people free to complain to the League that its territory is wrongfully held by an alien power, and to demand from the League action for its restoration?

And also, for instance: We interpret the provisions regarding Shantung to mean that Japan, in accordance with her own statements, is to receive the rights formerly wrongfully held by Germany, as an intermediary for their return to China?

At first I favored ratification without any qualification whatever, but the discussion has made me in favor of qualifying with those two interpretations.

Constitutional Powers of the President

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

May I suggest that the letter of Mr. Jessup in your last issue loses sight of the constitutional powers of the President with regard to the Treaty now before the Senate. The work of the American negotiators may be over, but the Executive is far from being functus officio. The ministerial duty of the State Department to certify the action of the Senate under Article 440 of the Treaty cannot be performed unless the Treaty is approved by the President. He it is who, under our Constitution, has the sole power to make treaties, though two-thirds of the Senate must concur in their ratification. If the Senate, whether by amendments or reservations equivalent thereto, tries to modify the Treaty, it thereby creates a new document which the President is not bound to accept or present to the Allied Powers. As Oppenheim points out (2nd Ed. Vol. I, S 517):

It follows from the nature of ratification as a necessary confirmation of a treaty already concluded that ratification must be either given or refused, no conditional or partial ratification being possible. That occasionally a State tries to modify a treaty in ratifying it cannot be denied, yet conditional ratification is no ratification at all, but equivalent to refusal of ratification. Nothing of course, prevents the other contracting party from entering into fresh negotiations in regard to such modifications; but it must be emphasized that such negotiations are negotiations for a new treaty, the old treaty having become null and void through its conditional ratification as identical with refusal of ratification, whereby the treaty falls to the ground. Thus, for instance, when the United States Senate on December 20, 1900, in consenting to the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty as regards the Nicaragua Canal, added modifying amendments, Great Britain did not accept the amendments and considered the treaty fallen to the ground.

In a note on the same page, this authority on International Law sets forth clearly the Presidential function:

It is of importance to emphasize that the United States Senate, in proposing an amendment to a treaty before its ratification, does not, strictly speaking, ratify such treaty conditionally, since it is the President, and not the Senate, who possesses the power of granting or refusing ratification; see Willoughby, "The Constitutional Law of the United States" (1910), I. p. 462, note 14. The President, however, according to article 2 of the Constitution, cannot grant ratification without the consent of the Senate, and the proposal of an amendment to a treaty on the part of the Senate, therefore, comprises, indirectly, the proposal of a new treaty.

The reservations now proposed by the majority of the Senate Committee would unquestionably make of the document before them a new treaty, requiring submission to the Allied Powers for ratification. It would have to be ratified also by Germany unless the Allies summoned her again to Versailles and compelled her acquiescence in the altered instrument.

The President probably knows very well the futility of thus opening again the discussions of the Peace Conference and it may well be questioned whether the Treaty will not come to a musty end in the pigeon holes of the State Department, if two-thirds of the Senate concur in the proposed alterations.

"Anti-Wilson"

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

THE article, "Anti-Wilson," in this week's Review, tempts one to elaborate the theme. Unfortunately, too many among us have the habit of using words carelessly and inaccurately. Persons who express strong disapproval and distrust are accused of hatred by those who are enamored of rhetoric and glittering generalities and who resent a comparison of words with acts, and of contradictory utterances in the past and present.

"Lest we forget!" is a phrase to be more highly cherished. The first milestone in the condition of distrust was, not in 1916, but in 1913, on the occasion of Mr. Wilson's unwarranted interference in the internal affairs of Mexico, whereby we became responsible for the state of anarchy afflicting that unhappy country for the last six years.

A good degree of modesty at the Council Table of Europe would, I feel, have been more fitting than an air, however veiled, of domination or dictation, which unquestionably has been resented privately, even if it has not been resented publicly.

If the World War was brought on by an ambitious nation desiring world dominion and was ruthlessly waged against those who were fighting for their own liberty and freedom, and to preserve civilization and common decency on the face of the earth, it should not have taken our President two and a half years to discover it and three and a half to decide really to employ "force to the limit." It might be well for him to reflect on this before reproaching the Senate for its dilatoriness in getting through with the business of ratifying the Peace Treaty.

We should have been in the war immediately after the sinking of the Lusitania. Reasonable prudence demanded that when we saw the greatness of the war we should have begun to prepare, in case we should later become involved. Instead, we entered unprepared at the eleventh hour, with no more reason than two years earlier. When we consider the millions of lives lost, the billions of money wasted, the agony and suffering of two long years which our earlier entrance into the war would have saved to Europe, with the resulting condition of poverty and anarchy, including the Bolshevism of Russia, how should we who shirked our duty so long boast of finishing the war and claim the right to dictate Peace terms because we were wholly altruistic and desired only to see justice prevail?

Our boast of altruism seems out of place. Suppose Germany victorious, occupying half of France, with the Channel ports, and dominating all of Eastern Europe, with the route to the Persian Gulf! Was the prospect pleasing? What might next have happened to us? It is stupid to suppose that we had not a vital interest in the preservation in full strength of the democratic nations of Western Europe.

We have had talk of our moral leadership. When did that begin? Not in 1914, when, instead of a protest on the invasion of Belgium, we were told to be neutral in thought. Not when the Lusitania was sunk or while the years went by, until the Fourteen Points were developed. Are these sufficient to make us the moral leader? In my opinion they have been a potent factor in the development of the present unreasoning world agitation. These Points were never endorsed by Congress and the election of 1918 showed clearly that the nation did not desire to endorse every sentiment of Mr. Wilson. It showed that the nation was tired of a dictatorship and that it had no wish to impose a dictator upon the Peace Conference or for a headship of a League of Nations, as some of us last November realized was the expectation and ambition.

A Peace Treaty might have been made that would have been accepted by the Senate six months ago. A League of Nations should have been a matter of slow growth and later deliberation. Lightly bound at first and on a basis of international law, the nations might gradually come into better understanding and closer union. A league in the framing of which Secretary Lansing and John Bassett Moore as Democrats, Col. House as the President's personal representative, Elihu Root and Taft or Hughes as Republicans had had a share, and one which they recommended with unanimity would have been received by the nation with far greater confidence than a league dominated by a single individual, however idealistic and unpractical.

With the deliberate intertwining of Peace Treaty with League, careful scrutiny should not be cause for complaint, nor divergence of opinion on so grave a matter seem unwarranted. It is also unseemly that we should assume our leaders and representatives to be abler or to have more zeal for justice than those of other nations. To sit at the Peace Table as counsellors with becoming modesty was a fitting part; to harmonize, if possible, where divergence appeared, and not by dictation to create dissension, as in the case of Italy and Fiume.

American Syndicalism

The I. W. W. A Study of American Syndicalism. By Paul Frederick Brissenden. New York: Columbia University. Longmans, Green and Co., Agents.

WHILE it may be substantially correct to designate the I. W. W. as a phase of syndicalism, it is well to point out, as Doctor Brissenden does, that it was at first essentially different from French revolutionary unionism and could justly boast American nativity, for it was the child of the Western Federation of Miners. True, certain Socialists officiated at its birth and strove for a time to direct its footsteps; but it was a headstrong infant, and presently the self-imposed guardians, and even the parent organization, left it to its own devices. It gradually drifted toward syndicalism, especially after the visits of "Bill" Haywood and William Z. Foster to Europe in 1908, 1910, and 1911, and the visit of Tom Mann to America in 1913; but it still differs from the French movement in several important respects, notably its decentralized organization and its antagonism to other labor unions.

The prime movers of the I. W. W. were representatives of a few unprosperous unions. The American Labor Union, of which the Western Federation of Miners was chief partner, met in Chicago in the fall of 1904, soon after the failure of the notorious Cripple Creek Strike, and sent a call to about thirty radical labor leaders and Socialists to meet in conference for the purpose of creating a double-barreled organization, both political and industrial, which should unite the working people of America on correct revolutionary principles and conform to the structure of the future Socialist society. At the conference in January, 1905, a Manifesto was drawn up explaining the principles and purposes of the new organization, and calling for a constitutional convention to meet in Chicago on June 27. The final draft of the Manifesto was made by A. M. Simons, editor of the International Socialist Magazine, and is an interesting example of the application of Marxian theory to modern industrial conditions in that it attributes the futility of craft unionism to the fact that the crafts themselves are being destroyed by the ever increasing use of machinery. Craft unionism, according to the Manifesto, represents divisions perpetuated from outgrown industrial stages; it fosters jealousy, organized scabbery, and disintegration; and it plays into the hands of the capitalists by entangling agreements based on the mistaken idea of harmony of interests between "employing exploiter and employed slave." This attack on "old-line unionism" was, of course, directed against the American Federation of Labor, which, the I. W. W. say, is neither American nor a federation of labor, and richly deserves to be called the "Separation of Labor." In place of this, the Manifesto declared, there should be "one great industrial union embracing all industries—providing for craft autonomy locally, industrial autonomy internationally, and working-class union generally."

As A. M. Simons, a member of the Socialist party, was prominent in the January Convention, so Daniel Loeb, alias De Leon, the "Pope of the Socialist Labor Party," dominated the June Convention, by which the constitution was adopted. The preamble, which was the work of Father T. J. Hagerty, with one or more collaborators, reads in part as follows:

The working class and the employing class have nothing in common. There can be no peace as long as hunger and want are found among millions of working people, and the few, who make up the employing class, have all the good things of life.

Between these two classes a struggle must go on until all the toilers come together on the political as well as on the industrial field, and take and hold that which they produce by their labor, through an economic organization of the working class, without affiliation with any political party.

These sad conditions can be changed and the interests of the working class upheld only by an organization formed in such a way that all its members in any one industry, or in all industries, if necessary, cease work whenever a strike or lockout is on in any department thereof, thus making an injury to one an injury to all.

One might think from utterances such as these that the I. W. W. originated in the brain of doctrinaire Socialists, whereas it was, at bottom, a labor movement in which the intellectuals had a voice, but not much control. They were prominent for a time, by virtue of their self-confidence, their positive convictions, and their gift of oratory; but soon the more radical forces got beyond their control and had to be allowed to run their course. Among the promoters of the movement were Socialists of opposing factions, like De Leon, Bohn, Simons, Debs, Untermann, and Father Hagerty; but there was a strong contingent of bitter and determined industrial unionists like Charles H. Moyer, W. D. Haywood, and Vincent St. John, of the Western Federation of Miners, John M. O'Neil, editor of the Miners' Magazine, Clarence Smith, of the American Labor Union, Charles O. Sherman, of the United Metal Workers, Frank M. McCabe and W. L. Hall, of the United Brotherhood of Railway Employees, W.

E. Trautman, editor of the Brauer Zeitung, and "Mother" Mary Jones, a firebrand of the Cripple Creek Strike—most of them socialistic, and some decidedly anarchistic in thought and action. It was a motley company of sectarians, and it is little wonder that they could not long travel the same road. Their later history reminds one of the Kirk of the Marrow so well described by Crockett, of its successive secessions and disruptions, and of the final Synod in which the Moderator and the Clerk, the sole surviving elders, solemnly excommunicated one another.

The first schism in the fellowship of the I. W. W. occurred at the second Convention, in 1906, when the "beggars, tramps, and proletarian rabble," under the leadership of Trautman, De Leon, and St. John, ousted President Sherman and abolished the office of president as savoring of aristocracy. After this purification, mere Socialists of a moderate stripe, like Simons and Debs, had no place in the I. W. W., realizing, as J. M. O'Neil said, that there was a vast difference between being class-conscious and being class-crazy.

The defection of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers in 1906 was a serious loss to the I. W. W., but the desertion of the parent organization, the Western Federation of Miners, in the following year, was a staggering blow. The trial of Moyer, Haywood, and Pettibone was going on at this time, and, although the men were acquitted, the Western Federation was badly discredited and the extreme faction, which had supported the I. W. W., lost control. Haywood himself was dismissed by the Federation in April, 1908, after which he devoted his talents to the I. W. W. and helped to pull it through a most critical period. The Western Federation, on the other hand, grew more conservative, and in the year 1911 it was affiliated with the American Federation of Labor.

By this time yet another fissure was developing in the I. W. W., between the doctrinaire Socialists, under De Leon, and the anarchistic Westerners, following St. John and Trautman. Believing with Marx that the political is but the reflection of the economic, De Leon and his friends had helped to launch the I. W. W., but when the movement was well under way they tried to direct it in accordance with their theoretical preconceptions, fearing, evidently, to trust the natural order of economic evolution. The "straight industrialists" of the West, resenting this pedantic and inconsistent domination, debarred De Leon and Ledermann from seats in the convention of September, 1908, with the result that, after much acrimonious discussion as to the blackness of pot and kettle, the great disruption occurred. Since then there have been two I. W. W.'s—the Chicago organization, regarded by the author as the real thing, and the Detroit I. W. W., which in 1915 changed its name to the Workers' International Industrial Union. The Detroit faction is the socialistic, pro-political, industrial union I. W. W.—the I. W. W. as it started out to be. The Chicago branch, on the other hand, which claims to be the original and only root, is the direct-actionist, or anarcho-syndicalist, or anti-political, or red I. W. W.—the "Bummery" or "Wobblies of the West." It is the I. W. W. of the Lawrence strike; of the lumber jacks of Washington and Oregon; of free speech fights at Spokane, Fresno, and San Diego; of strikes at Bisbee, Seattle, and Winnipeg; of the coal-miners strikes at Newcastle, Australia; of the Waterside Workers' strike in New Zealand; of the general strike in South Africa—the I. W. W. that gathers together the discontented and desperate of the world wherever trouble is to be found or made.

The history of these successive secessions from the I. W. W., as given by Doctor Brissenden, is of great significance as showing the revolutionary temper of a group of irreconcilables who claim to represent the relatively unskilled and unorganized workers, as opposed to the aristocracy of the American Federation of Labor. While they could hardly be called syndicalists at first, they have gradually become more syndicalistic in their opposition to doctrinaire Socialism and political action, in their talk about sabotage, the general strike and other forms of direct action, and in their efforts to convert the A. F. of L. by "penetration" or "boring from within," rather than by "hammering from without." Even as far back as 1911, William Z. Foster, who now poses as a regular unionist among the steel workers, became convinced that the weakness of the I. W. W. was largely due to its obstinate "dual unionism," and advised a radical change of policy. In a letter written to the Industrial Worker after his visit to Europe, he said:

I am satisfied from my observations that the only way for the I. W. W. to have the workers adopt and practice the principles of revolutionary unionism is to give up its attempt to create a new labor movement, turn itself into a propaganda league, get into the organized labor movement, and revolutionize those unions even as our French syndicalist fellow-workers have so successfully done with theirs.

Doctor Brissenden's excellent book is packed with information and will long remain the standard authority on the I. W. W., yet the profusion of detail somewhat obscures the view, and perhaps the author has too studiously avoided comment and philosophical interpretation of the manifold phenomena and the confused issues involved. His narrative is so impartial as to be almost colorless, notwithstanding the fact that he has spent most of his life in the West and could have added local color and personal touches here and there that would have made the picture more vivid, while not less true. This lack is partly supplied in the Appendix, which contains selections from the I. W. W. song book, "Wobblies," together with some of the quaint humor and pathos often shown by those rebellious spirits. One is tempted to quote at length from this choice collection, but must refer the reader to the selections.

Dreams from France

A LIFE AT STAKE. By Marcel Berger. Translated by Fitzwater Wray. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

LIGHT. By Henri Barbusse. Translated by Fitzwater Wray. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

"DON'T let us complain," says the good Gandolphe at the close of "A Life at Stake." "As long as the war lasts, it would be wrong to be happy." He is comforting himself for the loss of the domestic happiness which after all his sufferings has been snatched away; he is to turn his back on new-won love and return to the front. But how often that feeling has been echoed in the romantic literature of the war—such a feeling as we used to connect with the "New England conscience:" that happiness is a thing right or wrong according to circumstances, because a thing essentially selfish. Or at best a thing of chance: I have it, you have not—and the less said about it the better. Gandolphe loses his, Jean Darboise (like the hero of the same writer's "Ordeal by Fire") has the good luck to be invalidated, and therefore recovers the happiness which, like his life, has been staked on the die of battle. Jean is personally a better man for his experience—more of a man, at least. But it is Gandolphe, with his simple and noble spirit of altruism, who seems to point the higher moral of the story. It is with the Gandolphes that the hope of the future lies. He embodies his dream, as happens, in the theory of Socialism: "I could wish there were more affection and kindness in it. . . . That can be added. It is under that flag that we shall make our own new conquests. No more sectarians—the party is open to all of good-will. We shall appeal to all men who are capable of responding to the sight of human suffering, of surrendering something of their pleasures to relieve that suffering. Liberals, Radicals, Christians,—there is room for all in our ranks." The story is less impressive than "Ordeal by Fire," very likely because that was one of the earliest powerful fictions produced by the war, a tale which made no attempt to sentimentalize the brutalities of the new fighting, yet caught glimpses of a France and a world in some ways purified by that horror. Its central figure typified the pagan and individualistic France, devoted to "L'amour" and "Le sport," but with eyes averted from the nobler visions of a France which had not outlived its high mission.

If in this narrative and its predecessors Marcel Berger lays bare something of the terror and squalor of the latest warfare, he finds there neither despair nor the clear need of grasping some new and untried way of escape. And there is always a note of human cheerfulness which defends him from hysteria. We recognize in him that grudging, or saving restraint, that instinctive avoidance of intellectual or emotional excess which we are in the habit of identifying not merely with humor but with "Anglo-Saxon" humor. And this is the quality we miss in Henri Barbusse and Georges Duhamel, the two French writers who have found a wider fame than Berger's as interpreters of the war from the point of view of the individual. "Under Fire" shocked and enchanted a France which after all is never contented with the flourish of her rhetoric. Let us die, with a noble gesture, for "la patrie," yes: but let us acknowledge it in confidence to be a dingy and dispiriting job! Barbusse uttered boldly the unhappy thoughts and experiences and feelings of the poilu at his day's work; and something like a sigh of relief went up from thousands when the dismal familiar facts were at last put on record by a skilful pen. France had got that off her chest, at all events! In like manner the "Civilization" of Georges Duhamel gave expression to the deep pessimism that the spectacle of Europe tearing at her own vitals roused in so many sensitive breasts. And again France and a larger world breathed relief that the worst had at last been admitted. We might now be free to make a new beginning, somehow, in some direction, when there should be light enough, when the heart of man should have recaptured its own.

And at once these two disillusioned chroniclers of a tormented age have turned towards such a beginning. As fiction, "Light" is the tale of another individual "life at stake," another Frenchman going to war none too willingly and faring none too well: surviving to take up the burden of life as the war has refashioned it. What has it all meant, what does it leave him to hope for? It has freed him from sensualism and egotism and, it seems, from patriotism as well. It has revealed to him the corruption and instability of the world which has proved capable of such war, and it brings him a vision of possible good to come through the rebirth of society. And this is to come through the universal triumph of Light, or Truth, or Affection, for they are all the same thing: "Affection is the greatest of human feelings because it is made of respect, of lucidity, and light. To understand the truth and make oneself equal to it is everything; and to love is to know everything and to understand. Affection, which I call also compassion, because I see no difference between them, dominates everything by reason of its clear sight. It is a sentiment as immense as if it were mad. . . ." Is this generous mysticism, or commonplace, or sheer pretentious balderdash? Upon the reader's answer to this question is likely to hang his response to the prophet's advocacy of the extreme radical remedy for the sickness of our time. His prophecy of "the inevitable advent of the universal republic" (under which there shall be no more wrong or self-seeking wars or poverty or unhappiness) closes naturally with a cry for violence: "O you people of the world, you the unwearying vanquished of History, I appeal to your justice and I appeal to your anger. Over the vague quarrels which drench the strands with blood, over the plunderers of shipwrecks, over the jetsam and the reefs, and the palaces and monuments built upon the sand, I see the high tide coming. Truth is the only revolutionary by reason of error's disorder. Revolution is Order." With which triumphal reduction to the absurd a proletarian world which had finally thrown overboard both humor and common sense might well be content.

Neither of these "saving" qualities is present in "The Heart's Domain." The book quivers with emotion, with intellectual excitement, with prophetic zeal. It is full of eloquence, of passionate yearnings towards happiness for mankind. It never lets up for an instant, and we venture to guess that most "Anglo-Saxon" readers will be secretly or openly bored with it before, at the two-hundredth page, it arrives at the full stop. The truth is, we like even our prophets to "keep their hair on." We hate a scene, even if nobody is looking on, and we resent hysteria of the mind hardly less than of the body. As is customary with prophecies, its subject-matter is recognizable. M. Duhamel, we gather, has discovered that mankind was born to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. The old civilization is condemned: war has shown us its hollowness. To break with it we must seek individual happiness first of all. That happiness lies in simple living and honest human relations. The happiness of society hangs on our restoring moral and aesthetic culture as against scientific and industrial "progress." As for the question of authority, "there will not be lacking men of good will who will be glad to devote themselves to directing this liberty, to transforming the meaning and the demands of joy, propagating a culture which, unlike those old errors, will support education more readily than instruction—men who will more often address themselves to the heart than to the disastrous reason."

An Impartial View of the Irish Difficulty

IRELAND AND ENGLAND IN THE PAST AND PRESENT. By Edward Raymond Turner. New York: The Century Co.

THIS is in several respects an excellent and timely volume. It should be read by those Irishmen abroad who still think of the land of their ancestors as it was fifty or sixty years ago, before the growth of English liberalism had softened the harshness of an earlier régime and inspired the Gladstonian gospel of reparation. It should be studied with equal interest by those Englishmen who think of Ireland as a country of ceaseless discontent, upon which generous kindness is being lavished in vain, and who—utterly unacquainted as they often are with the historical roots of persisting bitterness—need just such a picture of old horrors as the first part of this book sets before them. Professor Turner's book is a valuable corrective to both sides. Lecky once said that Irish history is something for Englishmen to remember and for Irishmen to forget. Professor Turner, though he has clearly appreciated the element of wisdom in this advice, gives one the impression that he would amend it by urging that those on the east side of the Channel should think more of the remoter past and those on the west side more of the immediate present.

Quite apart from the value of this book as casting light on the controversies of our own day, it is to be highly commended as an historical summary, such as it would be hard to find in brief compass elsewhere, of early Irish development, of the literature, customs, systems of law, achievements of missionary enterprise which gave old Ireland a distinction largely unknown to the general reader. The second part of the book, entitled "The New Age: Atonement and Redress," presents in vigorous style those facts about the land war, the agricultural renaissance, and the nineteenth century struggle for Home Rule, with a marshalling of the arguments on both sides, which cannot fail to help those who wish to make up their minds upon a very urgent contemporary situation. The picture in the concluding part of the Irish literary revival should be considered by all who want to understand Sinn Fein. Prejudice, rhetoric, avoidance of inconvenient difficulties, have become so familiar to us in this field that we should welcome so signal a contribution in quite another spirit to a controversy still waiting—but unable to wait much longer—for its settlement.

It is in his treatment of the problem of "Ulster" that Professor Turner's book is least satisfactory. He does well, indeed, to insist that not all of the truth lies on either extreme side in that acrid dispute. He does well to compel his readers to a calm survey of the reasonableness which belongs, in some measure, to each. Like almost everyone else whose judgment is worth attending to, Professor Turner expects and desires some scheme of Irish Home Rule. But so long as one continues to wait for a scheme upon which everyone will agree, the hope of a decision is quite visionary. To speak about "No coercion for Ulster," without regard to what Ulster may choose to demand, is like speaking of "No coercion for Sinn Fein," with similar recklessness of what Sinn Fein may insist upon. It is quite unfair to convey, as Professor Turner does, that Nationalists and Carsonites should be looked upon side by side as separated by a mere honest difference of opinion. The contrast is far deeper than this, and it deserves at the present moment to have its tremendous significance pointed out.

On one side we see a constitutional agitation stretching over at least thirty years, an agitation that was patient, forbearing, ready for all compromises which did not sacrifice the great purpose, frowning upon violence, encouraging among its supporters only such hope as could base itself upon an effective and a reasoned appeal. On the other side we have had an orgy of seditious threats, seeking to terrify where it could not persuade, scouting all arrangements which did not mean complete capitulation to its own demand, setting at defiance every restraint by which British party strife is kept within wholesome limits, and relying chiefly upon that advantage which men who will stop at nothing so often command over those who will agitate only within the bounds of public safety. The present reviewer, who lived in Ireland until 1914, can recall how Unionist meetings used to be held there without tumult or disorder in such Nationalist cities as Limerick or Cork. He can also recall seeing the automobile of a British Cabinet Minister attacked by a mob in Belfast, a mob which was no chance collection of irresponsibles, but which had been incited by Ulster leaders to use physical force in preventing an address on Home Rule from being delivered in a public hall supported from public taxes by one of the King's Secretaries of State. The true counterpart to Carsonism is not Nationalism but Sinn Fein, and to this crucial fact the great organs of Conservative opinion in England, like the Times and the Observer, have slowly but at length decisively awakened.

The chief thing that one misses in Professor Turner's book is a clear realization that settlement can never come until the acceptance by a minority of what has been constitutionally decided upon after reasoned argument is enforced with impartial rigor. If the Peace Conference at Paris had waited until minorities everywhere were cordially satisfied it would be waiting still. If the Irish difficulty is to remain unsolved until Sir Edward Carson and Mr. De Valera coincide in their views, Ireland will continue to be the open sore of British administration. No moral is just now quite so much needed as the moral of playing the game by the game's rules. No other suggestion is quite so dangerous in a world tormented with "Bolshevism" as the suggestion that if a few are prepared to resist "unto the death" the many can be alarmed into acquiescence in anything. One may feel some surprise that Professor Turner's readers should require quite so elementary a discipline as his book has given them in historical facts, in candor, in recognition that truth belongs rarely to one disputant alone. We know at the same time that on this special question such warnings and such guidance were sorely needed, and we are thankful to our author for having provided them. But his book, like every other book, has the defect of its qualities. The danger of a dispassionate treatment is that in excess of charity, and prolonged balancing, and zeal for openness of mind, we may lose the chance of a practical conclusion. Unfortunately it is a practical conclusion which, before all things, is just now urgent. We would remind Professor Turner that in order to be fair and unbiased it is not necessary to be forever unable to "choose one's horn in the dilemma." This is perhaps the besetting sin of an academic temperament, and a reviewer who is himself of the professorial class may be forgiven if he quotes a recent admonition which that class should lay to heart. It is in the words of an Oxford don in one of Mr. H. G. Wells's novels. "We have ideas, we have imagination, that is our strength. And that is our weakness. . . . All intellectuals are flimsy and uncertain people. It's not only that they are critical and fastidious; they are weak-handed."

Professor Turner may perhaps reply that he had to do one thing at a time, and that the thing he chose to do was a presenting of facts. He has presented many at least of his facts well, and we are his debtors. But the grim fact of force struggling for the suppression of argument is one of the facts he might have profitably included.

HERBERT L. STEWART

PIERRE CORNEILLE. Par Auguste Dorchain. Paris: Garnier Frères.

IT would seem a priori that Pierre Corneille of Rouen and Paris, poet, dramatist, and critic (the masterly examens attached to his plays certainly entitle him to the addition of the third title), should be well handled by Auguste Dorchain of Rouen and Paris, poet, dramatist, and critic. And in fact the new biography can not fail to prove a delight to all lovers of Corneille and of candid, colorful French. Not in years has a more readable biography appeared. The work is scholarly (but why is there no index?) exhaustive at most points, and except for a date or two, apparently careful and accurate. But most grateful of all, it is a throbbingly vivid and sympathetic story of a noble soul and a fine life. Dorchain is a hero-worshipper, but Corneille has been cried down undeservedly, and a vigorous eulogy was needed. Most of us, perhaps, were inclined to agree with the old playwright himself that his chief merits were those of a dramatist, but under the tuition of the eager schoolmaster Dorchain we begin to see merits in his lyric verse which escaped us before, and having sat at his feet for a few hundred pages, we have fallen into the spirit of his thesis so thoroughly that we even accept without gasping the statement that, with Ronsard and Hugo, Corneille has the fullest sense of lyric orchestration which any French poet has possessed. We had found his occasional lyrics unequal and often tame; but commented by Dorchain, they really make fair reading. It is certainly truer than most of us imagined that there is often a flexibility, a variety, a gorgeous color-play in the Cornelian line which comes a long way towards Victor Hugo.

For Corneille as dramatist, his most recent biographer has made his point, beyond a doubt. For breadth, depth, variety, nobility, and at his best, for spontaneous beauty, Corneille has no rival in the French drama. He launched Molière in comedy, and it is not certain that the younger man ever passed "Le Menteur." Boileau refused to rank Racine at all with the trio of immortals comprising Corneille, Molière, and his own resplendent self; and whatever may be true of the comparative merit of the poet-psychologist Racine and the critic-dogmatist Boileau, there is no Racinian heroine quite equal in sheer beauty to the matchless Pauline of "Polyeucte," and no Racinian play quite so admirably built as the marvelous "Rodogune." This most original of French playwrights—for his comedy, his tragedy, his melodrama, his dramatic spectacle, were all innovations, all took with him a definite form which they had not had before and which they retained in the hands of later writers—this Lessing of the French stage, was also its Schiller, its Shakespeare, and its Sheridan.

Corneille's relatively quiet career knew two spectacular interruptions—the Academy's strictures on the "Cid," and the rivalry with Racine—both of which have been currently magnified far beyond their real significance. The Academy had no authority to criticise the work of a non-member unless it was specifically submitted for an opinion, which was never the case with the "Cid"; and the Academy's published estimate was an equal balancing of praise and blame. After his first extravagances, Corneille had already been verging towards unity of place as well as of action, so that the Academy had not much to say to him. And as to the downfall which is sometimes asserted to have come with the contrast of the two versions of "Bérénice"—Corneille's and Racine's—neither knew beforehand that the other was handling the same subject, so that there was no such conscious rivalry as it would be interesting to read into the situation. Corneille wrote three fairly successful plays afterwards, quitting the stage only a year or two before his young rival, and during the very last years of his life there was such a renewal of interest in his dramas as must have salved whatever wounds the earlier successes of the younger man, long since retired and given over to religious practices, may once have caused him.

It is true, moreover, and this is the time to notice it, that Corneille's dramas are the very essence of his nation's spirit. Corneille, whatever his exact rank in the group of the noblest French poets, is the most French of all. Of his four sons and sons-in-law who wore the French colors three died in battle; and the Cid, Horace, Cinna, are other children of his, eager to pour out their life-blood for their country. Corneille was no courtier, no blind worshipper of the "Roi Soleil," but he was the throbbing heart of that sensitive race who love their country as no other race ever loved theirs. Corneille the Titan, and not the listless decadents of yesterday, is the real France which we came to know when we fought beside her against the Beast. And we who love France should learn to know Corneille better.

The Run of the Shelves

DODD, MEAD have just issued, in an attractive and well-illustrated octavo, "The Story of Our Merchant Marine," by Willis J. Abbott, to whose interest in things nautical are due his "Blue Jackets of '76, of 1812, of '61 and of '98," also "American Ships and Sailors," all of which testify to his competence. His present contribution to the literature of the seas is characterized by great skill in narration and by emphasis of points interesting, educational, suggestive, thrilling, or tragic. Under separate chapters the work briefly deals with the birth, growth, and decline of our merchant navy; the slave trade; whaling; Arctic explorations; the astounding traffic on the Great Lakes; the development and decadence of navigation on the Mississippi and its tributaries; American shipbuilding during the recent war. It would be difficult to find elsewhere a more useful popular compendium of information on these topics. Its reading will stimulate a desire to delve more deeply into the history of any of his subjects. Possibly the concluding chapter will most forcibly rivet attention, since in it he discusses the pressing questions of the future of commerce under the American flag. He appears to favor subsidies, a form of assistance which, falling on the taxpayers, is likely to encounter a considerable opposition.

Arthur Symons's "Studies in the Elizabethan Drama" (E. P. Dutton & Co.) consists of papers on ten of Shakespeare's plays and three additional essays on Massinger, Day, and Middleton and Rowley, respectively. The items that make up the volume have all been published before—the earliest of them, the paper on "Titus Andronicus" (1885), now upwards of thirty years ago; the latest—the chapter on Middleton and Rowley, contributed originally to the Cambridge History of English Literature—in 1907. Much the larger part of the volume was written in the decade which closed with 1890, but both the earlier and later studies are here reproduced with no changes, except in matters of style. It cannot be said that the Shakespearean papers open up any new critical vistas in the study of the great dramatist. The author's interpretations follow strictly orthodox lines and the note of laudation is virtually unbroken. There is no hint here, either, of the historical or comparative methods which are so strongly emphasized with us.

In general, no serious objection can be raised to this neglect, for a critic has, of course, the right to choose his own line of approach to his subject. There are times, however, when the prosaic instrument of historical research will illuminate obscurities that would baffle mere critical acumen, left to itself for an indefinite period. This is conspicuously the case with at least one of the plays, dealt with in the present volume, viz. "Troilus and Cressida." Symons interprets this apparently cynical play as expressing Shakespeare's philosophy of life in one period of his career—as a wilful parody on the "tale of Troy divine," determined by that philosophy. But the studies of Professors Tatlock and Lawrence have proved that Shakespeare's conception of the Trojan legend did not differ, in essentials, from that which the Elizabethans generally had inherited from the later Middle Ages—only, with his marvellous genius, he has imparted to this degraded tradition an intense dramatic life.

Two of the Shakespearean papers—namely, those on "Titus Andronicus" and "Henry VIII"—are devoted to the problems concerning Shakespeare's share in the authorship of these plays; the remainder are occupied primarily with the analysis of famous Shakespearean characters. Only one of the latter group attains the length of twenty pages, so that in elaborateness they do not compare with many recent studies of this kind. Nevertheless, the analysis, in the most favorable instances—e. g. Cleopatra and Juliet—if it does not sound the greatest depths, shows a fine discrimination in characterization, and this quality, together with the uniform finish of style and frequent felicities of phrase, gives these essays a certain distinction.

Of more value than the Shakespearean studies are the concluding chapters on the dramatists contemporary with Shakespeare who were named above. In fact, these chapters offer the best appreciations that we have of the writers in question. Particularly happy is the essay on Day. Through its delicate sympathy and charm of style this study is likely to rescue from oblivion a minor dramatist who stood in need of such critical assistance.

When one takes in hand Marguerite Wilkinson's "New Voices" (Macmillan) and notes that the critical essays and cited poems of which its texture is wrought require four hundred closely printed pages for their accommodation, one wonders that so much can still be said. After inspection, one wonders that so much can say so little. Not that the book lacks truth—lacks judgment of a kind. In a sense the location of Mrs. Wilkinson's mind in the world of opinion is desirable. Her windows look sunnily eastward, and the view is extensive, at least over those newly plotted suburbs in the city of literature which, if we may trust their inhabitants, will shortly be the heart of the town. Modernity and good-nature—that is Mrs. Wilkinson.

The outstanding trait in the book is facility—facile dicta, facile analysis, facile English. We are not surprised to hear that the sale has been facile. The greatest intellectual difficulties cease to be difficulties, if one has the courage simply to let them be. Mrs. Wilkinson is not wanting in that courage. In the long chapter on organic rhythm the mechanism of free verse, which bristles with uncertainties and perplexities, is practically let alone, while Mrs. Wilkinson retreats to the shelter of the peaceful generalization that the rhythm of a poem should be pre-existent in the poet's soul. She never liked scansion, and the slighted anapaests and amphibrachs of her rebellious youth have their instant of revenge when she cites Mr. Frost's "Something there is that doesn't love a wall" as an example of irregularity or relaxation in blank verse. Her antipathy to the post-Victorians is intense, yet if they are what she says they are, they may be said to have provided a pattern as well as a target for her criticism. Granting freely that poetry and criticism are distinct things, it is still curious to observe that Mrs. Wilkinson's critical habits are the antithesis of her poetical tastes. She praises poetry that says things concisely, finally, concretely, and without didacticism, and she praises it in a criticism that is diffuse, self-repeating, addicted to generality, and pedagogic at every turn. The post-Victorians often uttered just thought in flawless metre. Mrs. Wilkinson often lays down sound principles in correct English. There is a delicate suggestion in the fact that Mrs. Wilkinson cannot read the post-Victorians.

Admirable instances of library coöperation between Great Britain and the United States may be seen in two works of a highly technical character, which have recently appeared in the field of thirteenth century British history. These are "The Great Roll of the Pipe for the Twenty-sixth Year of the Reign of King Henry the Third, 1241-1242," prepared and edited by the late Henry L. Cannon, of Leland Stanford University, printed in England by the Arden Press, printers for the Pipe Roll Society, and published in America by the Yale Press in its series of historical publications (1918); and the Leadam and Baldwin "Select Cases before the King's Council, 1243-1482," printed at the Harvard University Press for the Selden Society of Great Britain and issued as volume xxxvi of the series of that society (1919). These two works, designed especially for scholars and making no appeal to the public at large, are a splendid tribute to American scholarship and to the University presses that share in their publication.

Here are two contributions to pure research, characterized by the investigator's love of learning and humility of demeanor, and completed during years of mental distraction, which serve to allay the fears, held in some quarters, that because of the war, scholarship has received a blow from which it will not easily recover. There is no doubt that present needs and problems are absorbing the time and attention of many who under more normal conditions might be concerning themselves with the history of the past, but the fact that there still remains a saving remnant, silently engaged in the unselfish task of advancing knowledge and keeping alight the torch of learning, is a happy augury for the future. That two of those concerned with the editing of the volumes here under consideration—a work self-effacing at best and bringing no compensation other than the joy of the doing—should not have lived to see the fruition of their labors, adds a pathetic interest.

There must be a very considerable number of people of the sort who find pictures of old houses and old gardens that have been adapted to modern uses quite irresistible. In these books the text is nothing, or very little, but the pictures—well, the present reviewer is willing to acknowledge that he is unable to refrain from paging through a volume like Albert G. Robinson's "Old New England Doorways" (Scribner) from cover to cover. Here the text is more than usually negligible, but it is also unusually brief, and the plates photographically represent portals through which no one could daily pass without a constant enlargement of the soul and by which no one could pass without a glance that would yield a permanent enrichment to the treasury of the inward eye.

Consider Ludendorff and Me

I WONDER if the world seems as queer and topsy turvy to you as it does to Ludendorff and me. Ludendorff and I are writing pieces for the papers. It's my regular job. I am used to it. It's a new game to Ludendorff, but it's his way and my way of making a living at the present juncture in the onward march of civilization. After all the turmoil and convulsion, after all the rack and ruin, as the murk clears and the dust settles down, Ludendorff and I are revealed each at the old typewriter pounding out copy. I am sure there is a great moral lesson in the spectacle if I could only formulate it and drag it to light.

The whirligig of chance and the sportive little gods that control men's destinies have never done anything more comic. When I think of what Ludendorff was! Only a year ago I was huddled in a hole wondering whether he was going to gobble me up. He was a menace to the world, breathing fire and slaughter and destruction. His word put great masses of armed men in motion, and death and devastation followed in their track. Now, in our office, his stuff goes upstairs to the composing room at night slugged "Heinie" and gets put on page 4 with the furniture ads.

Ludendorff and I never did agree about the war. We were on opposite sides. He was conspicuous and powerful. I was inconspicuous and feeble. He was a professional warrior and I wasn't even a semi-pro. I was just a Class B amateur. But, at that, I am not afraid to match my "war record" against his. I'll concede that I didn't do the Germans as much harm as Ludendorff did us and our Allies, but to offset that I didn't do our side as much harm as Ludendorff did his side. He just about ruined his own crowd. The Allied side never took any hurt from me.

Ludendorff's present occupation is a symbol, a sign, of the great change that has come over the world. It is something as yet hardly realized. It's incredible that only a year ago millions of men had their lives put in jeopardy every day by this man now writing for the newspapers and trying to justify his past foolishness. Because I remember those days so vividly I read his apology and defense with absorbing interest. He seemed then to bestride the world. All our intelligence and all our skill were devoted to trying to find out what he had in mind, what he was going to do next, in what part of the line he would try to overcome and kill us. Of course, he had his troubles, too.

Never were Ludendorff and I so out of harmony and agreement as on August 8, last year. "August 8 was the black day of the German army in the history of this war," says Ludendorff. "By the early hours of the forenoon I had already gained a complete impression of the situation. It was a very gloomy one," he adds. It was the gloomiest day of the war to Ludendorff. It was the brightest, gayest, and happiest of all days to me. I was too inveterate a baseball fan not to know the "break" when I saw it. Long before the early forenoon of that joyous day I, too, had already gained a complete impression of the situation and it was anything but a gloomy one. I had a hunch that it was all over, and that what was to come would be merely playing out the schedule until the Hun collapsed.

I began to bet my pay in various messes that the war would be over before Christmas. The slightly phosphorescent trail that marked my happy progress in London in January after the armistice was possible because I had cashed my bets. That is when and that is how in a moment of high exaltation I bought my lilac and lavender dressing gown, which has since intrigued the fancy of so many beholders. It is not exactly the sort of thing one would buy except in a high moment. I look upon it as indirectly a gift from Ludendorff to me.

I can give you an interesting experiment you can make for yourself in the mechanics of vision. It will help you see clearly and understand the present world we live in that so bristles with odd and quaint phenomena. Take any man of the "great" and "mighty"—any of the temporarily luminous figures who stand out above their fellows and regard them long enough and steadily and you will see just a plain middle-aged man engaged in making a living or trying to justify some past foolishness. It's easy enough to do. In the dry white light of these troublous days the rose tints of glamour can't be seen. Let's try it with Ludendorff. As a sort of background to help induce the proper mental attitude it might be as well to keep in mind that a saddle-maker has succeeded the Hohenzollerns as head of the German state.

Let's go on with Ludendorff. He is a significant figure because of what he was and what he is to-day. August 8 made him a writer for the newspapers. It's a thing he never dreamed of. It never entered his Prussian military head that he would be impelled and compelled to try to justify himself to common men at home and abroad for the life he had lived and the things he had done and tried to do. He probably needed the money, too. Consider his background. All of his life after he ceased to be a school boy was spent in the German army worshiping and training brute force. He was out of the common world of men. His idea of his fellow men was of inferior creatures who could be taught to obey blindly, to fight and to kill at a superior's bidding. He helped train millions to that end. At the end they broke down on him, because they were human beings. His present estate and plight was foreshadowed when we collared a grimy little German, badly in need of a shave, near Villers Carbonel, on that long straight road, the longest and straightest in France, I think, that runs from Amiens to Verdand. He had a letter in the breast pocket of his coat from his brother in Hamburg. I read it:

My dear Ludwig: The war is going to end now—is it not so? We have declared that we would evacuate the occupied territory so that we could enter upon an armistice and peace negotiations with the enemy. According to my opinion, we shall have an armistice this Thursday. Then, at least, the killing will cease. It is very clear, anyhow, that we must finally have peace, inasmuch as we cannot oppose such a number of enemies. I pray to God every day that the Good Lord will protect you, for if we should soon have peace, and we should lose you, it would be the finish of our lives. Therefore, I advise you again—take good care of yourself, especially in these last days. I always hope that you may be captured so that nothing can happen to you in these last moments. I am always so anxious and at the same time so happy that the terrible war is coming to an end. I can scarcely wait till you come to the German border, for then at least your life will be safe. We shall soon have peace. That is certain, for we must have peace. As I have already told you, you will be back to us this Christmas to stay—that is, if nothing should happen to you in those last days. Take good care, for on this Thursday we will have an armistice; on that you can depend.

Ludwig was not the only soldier to receive and obey that sensible advice from relatives at home, "take good care of yourself, especially in these last few days." Ludendorff knew about these letters. He couldn't stop them. Even now when he writes about those days he gets furiously enraged. When common sense began to seep into the German soldier's head and he saw the jig was up, Ludendorff called it "low morale."

Not long before we got Ludwig and read his brother's letter, we managed to lay hands on a report of the examination of American prisoners by the General Staff of the Seventh German Army. It was signed "v. Berg, Army Intelligence Officer." I kept a copy of it which you may read:

The moral effect of our fire was not able to stop the advance of the infantry seriously. The American's nerves have not yet become worn out.

The troops are in good spirits and full of a naive confidence.

The statement of one prisoner is characteristic, "We kill or are killed."

It was impossible to obtain any information. The prisoners will give scarcely any information as to where they were in line.

Generally speaking, the prisoners make a good impression and seem wide awake.

At present, they look at the war from the point of view of the "big brother" who has come to help his oppressed brothers and sisters, and is everywhere received with friendship. Their feelings, however, have a certain moral basis. The majority of the prisoners express themselves with a simplicity which is comprehensible, and declare that they have come to Europe to defend their country.

Only a few men are pure Americans by birth. The majority are the sons of immigrants. These half-Americans, however, who were nearly all born in America and have never been in Europe, express, without hesitation, the same feelings as the pure-bred American.

Ludwig's letter and that report is the secret history of Ludendorff's morning appearance on the fourth page telling how it happened. The poor old dear does not understand yet—and never will. I think it may be said of him, as the old phrase ran, that he has "drifted into journalism."

It's right much interesting and it helps me to visualize clearly the "period of reconstruction," as it is being called. I knew things would be somehow different when I came back home from the wars and resumed where I left off, but I never expected to find old Ludendorff writing for the newspapers with Frank Simonds and Walt Mason and William Allen White and me. It's a queer, queer world, and something or other happens to a man every day.

Drama

John Masefield at the Garrick Theatre

JOHN MASEFIELD'S "Faithful," now offered by the Theatre Guild at the Garrick Theatre, is a story of Japanese revenge. Modern problems, the breach between reactionary and liberal, touch the play only as a shimmer or phosphorescence; its core would be grasped by a Sicilian or Kentuckian to-day. What Messina or Louisville might fail to understand is the emphasis on ceremony. The actors are so much gowned that the extraction of the dagger from the gown is a serious undertaking, and, in the same way, the drama, especially in the first act, is so swathed in ceremony that the extrication of the action from its folds is troublesome to an Occidental. The high-souled Asano, played with rich repose and lustrous melancholy by Mr. Rollo Peters, stabs his enemy, Kira, on the ground, or at least the pretext, that Kira has played him false in a pious formality, and the self-slaughter to which Asano is unhesitatingly condemned avenges, not the small hurt to Kira, but the insulted ritual. The singular thing is that these ceremonies, which are caressed with Oriental solicitude, are got through with Occidental despatch; after all, Mr. Masefield was not born in Yokohama.

The death of Asano closes the first act, which serves as a prologue to the two following acts in which the revenge is planned and consummated by Asano's friends. Up to an early point in Act II, the play, though stirring acted, has not really stirred us. It has been too far off; it has come to us like the dimmed reverberation of some powerful clang of the knocker to the occupant of some distant turret in a great house. In Act II that door is opened—indeed, it is broken in—by Mr. Augustine Duncan in the major part of Kurano. Kurano has been with us briefly in the first act as Asano's counselor, a powerful and statesman-like figure, in whom massiveness and policy are blended in a fashion that might have sunk to Mazarin or risen to Cavour. In Act II the man is superficially transformed. He begins by repudiating his wife, taking a concubine in her stead before her face in a curious and delicate scene in which the wife's part, beautifully taken by Miss Helen Westley, has the preciousness and speciousness of ivory. Kurano has really little against his wife, except the unwifely oversight of not breaking her neck in a fall. He rejects her as one part of that frippery of respectability which he must cast aside in the slow pursuit of his dissembling and circuitous revenge. He plunges into drink and riot; no hint of his deadly purpose shall escape from the mouth to which the lips of women and the lips of flagons shall serve as the alternate seals. Levity in massiveness is dimaying, and solemnity under jest is rather awful; and both feelings combine in the heartiness of the auditor's response to the energy and brilliancy—I do not say the flawlessness—with which this part is taken by Mr. Augustine Duncan.

The third act is chilling to our hopes. The new Kurano has made a new play for us; in Act III the old Kurano drags back the old play, and the outflash of character in the second act contracts to a resplendent episode. For this shrinkage Mr. Masefield is responsible. The revenge that finally comes is debile. Kira—actuated no doubt by compassion for the straits of baffled homicides and tired dramatists—sleeps for a night without his guards. His enemies sweep down upon his defenselessness, and numbers are cheaply victorious. The pitifulness of this outcome is somewhat glossed over by lyric and spectacular attractions; there is a Corybantic exuberance in the field scene which would tell in opera, and the final tableau serves not ineffectively to clinch and rivet an earlier tableau in the bloody termination of Act I. The "Faithful," though strong in parts, is not a great play, but the Theatre Guild are entitled to high praise for the skill with which they have husbanded its force and shielded its infirmities.

The local color, inevitable in a Japanese play of our time, has not been overdone. Mr. Masefield and his interpreters have both been astute in not suffering the drama to become too markedly "japanned." The play intimates rather than expounds Japan: its costumes are sufficiently Eastern or, un-Western, but do not put the spectator into the frame of mind in which he inspects a cage of macaws and paroquets in Central Park; the simple but haunting screen-work was bountiful in the leave it gave us to divine a country which it did not ask us to dissect or to peruse. The palace of Kira was less skilfully conceived; it was impossible to believe that fear listened or that vengeance crouched behind those membranous partitions.

O. W. FIRKINS

Music at the Metropolitan

TO the Maplesons and Abbeys of a by-gone age, an opera season meant a great adventure. Things might go right. Or they might all go wrong. The plans of managers were built on sand.

But times have changed. And now our opera managers no longer shudder at the threat of bankruptcy. They engage their singers and announce new works with the assurance that behind them they have millions. Though they should drop some money on their season, their backers, bless them, can well bear the loss. Besides, they will not lose their salaries. So, anyway, you see, they stand to win.

Thanks to those backers and his subscription list, Mr. Gatti-Casazza, in announcing his twelfth season at the Metropolitan, can face the future free from business cares. He knows he can depend upon society. From floor to roof most of his seats are sold before his doors open. And, four times out of six, for five long months, the opera "fans" will fill his standing spaces.

On examining Mr. Gatti-Casazza's twelfth prospectus, we find a little that may warrant us in believing, or at least in hoping, that these legitimate and natural expectations will be realized. And, on the other hand, we fancy we perceive some lacks and flaws which are not cheering. The novelties and revivals which are promised for the approaching season include some works which will undoubtedly be welcome.

Among them, first and foremost, I may mention the revival of "Parsifal" in English, with a new English text supplied by H. E. Krehbiel. Whatever we may think of the brash effort of a German enterprise to produce opera in German at the Lexington, no sane American could seriously object to the performance of so austere and sweet a masterpiece as Wagner's "Parsifal," in our own tongue at the Metropolitan. We may look forward to the re-appearance in the Metropolitan repertory of that "consecrational music drama;" first, because it is dignified and very beautiful; and next because, by the substitution of English words for German (quite in accordance with the wish of the composer) its meaning may again be made quite plain to those who hear it played and sung. It will afford much satisfaction to the many thousands who wish to hear all opera, soon or late, made plain to them in their own language (a privilege insisted on by French, German, and Italian opera-goers in their respective countries) to observe that, notwithstanding his old advocacy of "opera only in the original idiom," Mr. Gatti-Casazza has once more made a concession to our national aspirations. He had done something, as we know, of the same kind already by producing the "St. Elizabeth" of Liszt in English. Moreover, though apparently so rigid in his artistic theory, he had ignored it many times by presenting "Boris Godounow" and "Le Coq d'Or" and other Russian works, in Italian, French, and German; "Prodana Nevesti" in German and "Orfeo ed Euridice" in French.

So far, so good. Yet there is reason for some fear that, while in principle acceding to the fast-growing wish of most Americans to enjoy the meanings as well the music of lyric drama, Mr. Gatti-Casazza may have omitted to ensure a clear rendering of "Parsifal" in English by selecting artists trained to sing our language clearly. Unhappily for himself, as well as us, the present manager of the Metropolitan, an Italian, has not found time to master our language; and, as a consequence, he cannot judge how well or ill his singers wrestle with the art of English diction.

The announcement of Henry Hadley's one-act opera, "One of Cleopatra's Nights," inspired by an English text, and based on Théophile Gautier's well known story, should, in a measure, also gratify American opera-goers. I have no knowledge of this work. It may be good or bad. But it can scarcely be so trivial as the two operas picked out (why, none could tell) last season for production as representative of our dramatic music. Mr. Hadley is just now much talked of here and we may hope that with his promised "Cleopatra" he will do better than he did some time ago with his "Beata" and "Azora." Then we shall wait to see if other men, like Charles M. Loeffler and John Carpenter, will have a hearing on the boards of the Metropolitan.

As to the foreign novelties, I see less cause for praise. "La Juive" of Halévy, though it may suit the French, is not a work which will appeal to New York audiences. It is as pompous as the most inflated Meyerbeer opera; inferior in its own style to "Les Huguenots" and even to "L'Africaine;" and it is painfully old-fashioned. The return of Massenet's "Manon," with the restoration of the vivacious Cours-la-Reine episode, usually omitted here, would be agreeable to us, if some one of the type of Edmond Clément were to appear as the young lover of the opera and if a really youthful and more spontaneous artist than the one announced were to sing the part of the protagonist. Some are wondering why that lovely work of Massenet, "Le Jongleur de Nôtre-Dame," is still excluded from Mr. Gatti-Casazza's repertory.

A lyric setting by Albert Wolff of the most popular (though by no means most poetic or important) play of Maeterlinck, "L'Oiseau Bleu," is included among the novelties. As it has not been heard so far on any stage, all I will say of it is that its composer is supposed to have much talent. But, before paying M. Albert Wolff the compliment of producing him, Mr. Gatti-Casazza surely might have remembered that admittedly great lyric drama, Gustave Charpentier's "Louise," and that far finer, if less "popular" and effective, work, the "Pelléas et Mélisande" of Debussy.

"Eugen Onegin," which is also promised (with an Italian text) might wisely have been left to its right field, the concert room. Made out of Pushkin's poem, it rarely moves one, despite the interest of Tchaikowsky's scores. Though rather drab and dull as lyric drama, as music pure and simple it may please. One episode, at least, has what one needs in opera—dramatic beauty and contrasted charms.

But what on earth induced Mr. Gatti-Casazza to dig up for New York Rosini's long forgotten opera-buffa, "L'Italiana in Algeri," when twenty modern works of vital interest screamed for a hearing. And why should Leoncavallo's tawdry "Zaza" have had precedence over a hundred vastly more important operas? His Italian feeling may, to some extent, explain both mysteries. But what in Italy may be quite right, seems far from right in these United States. The Metropolitan is not the Scala, though now and then one might suppose it was.

Some additions to the Metropolitan singers are announced. Orville Harrold, the young tenor who was revealed to us by the late Mr. Hammerstein, will strengthen the American contingent. Two Italian mezzo-soprani of importance, Gabriella Besanzoni (a South American favorite) and Carolina Lazzari (formerly of the Chicago company) are also to sing for us. But we read nothing in the twelfth prospectus of Mr. Gatti-Casazza as to the engagement of the great Paris tenor, Muratore, who would have lent dignity and charm to the French repertory. And the most famous of all living Italian baritones, Galeffi and Titta Ruffo, have both (for reasons which to some of us seem sadly obvious) been permitted to slip away to the Chicago organization.

The omissions, like the suggestions of the prospectus, show plainly that the management of the Metropolitan trusts, as in former years, to the voices of Caruso, Amato, Geraldine Farrar, Margarete Matzenauer, Didur, and a few more for the prosperity of its enterprise. A few of those prized voices may be shopworn. But—this season will hear them all again.

Books and the News

[Under this heading are presented, from week to week, articles mentioning a few books which should be useful to the reader who wishes to go a little further into matters of current interest than the newspapers and periodicals will take him. Attempt is made to keep the articles practical by naming only books which ought to be available, without much trouble through publisher, book-shop, or public library. Books obscure or out of print are avoided, and books in English are preferred to those in other languages. These articles are in no sense bibliographies for the specialist, aiming at completeness, and including magazine or newspaper articles, but merely brief, impartial, selected lists of books, new and old, which may help to make the news of the week more intelligible. The articles are written by the Editor of Publications of the New York Public Library.]

Armenia

THE proposal for an American expeditionary force to take Armenia under the protection of this country arouses a new interest in the land and the people whose name is synonymous with martyrdom and sorrow. Writings about Armenia are, to a large extent, still in foreign languages, or confined to articles in periodicals. There are enough convenient books in English, however, depicting stirring scenes of the old crusade, symbolizes the victorious crusade of the great war. As President Poincaré said of our troops, perceiving the application of the old legend to our day, "Your gallant battalions brought with them the enthusiasm of crusaders leaving for the Holy Land."

These heroic Grail pictures, representing the quest and triumph of right over evil, speak a great lesson, in a great way, to the youth of our country; and they make artistic and singularly fitting

Soldier Memorials

For an indoor memorial, where the impression is intimate and direct, nothing perhaps can equal this splendid series of panels. They are strikingly beautiful and they are extremely interesting in their significant "story."

To those who welcome back their own, and to those who mourn for soldiers who made the supreme sacrifice, the Grail pictures have an appeal of matchless significance and vitality. Also, they make a fine gift to every soldier as a personal memorial of his service.

Abbey's Grail properly belongs in every home, club, office, school, library, parish house, public building—in every place that had the honor of a starred flag.

These Grail Pictures are an answer to the perplexing question how to select a memorial that shall be at once appropriate and artistic.

GALAHAD THE DELIVERER, from Abbey's Holy Grail: Prototype of the modern soldier, "he delivered the country from the wickedness that lay upon it."

"In his triumphant defeat of these enemies of the human race—Huns, if you will—he is able to deliver the imprisoned virtues (the Castles of the Maidens) whose names in present parlance are Personal Liberty, Respect for Just Authority, Decency, Honor, Sacredness of Obligations—all those threatened heritages. At last made safe for democracy and by democracy." And so on. Particulars sent on request. Done exclusively in

As Lindsay M. Swift has said in a little monograph on the subject, "One may well read this series of Abbey's Grail panels by the glorious light which shines on the present.

"In the Vision one sees a pre-figuration of modern youth born into a land which calls for consecration to lofty deeds of patriotism.

"In the Vow of Knighthood the youth devotes himself to the life that shall ennoble himself and enrich his country.

In the Round Table of King Arthur, Galahad begins to understand the dangers that beset one who is to take his place among those who would both serve and lead.

"In the Conquest of the Seven Sins one discerns the youth confronted with foes bent on the obliteration of everything that mankind has respected and preserved.

to give any inquirer some idea of the Armenians, their country, their history, and the outrageous wrongs they have suffered.

H. F. B. Lynch's "Armenia; Travels and Studies" (Longmans, 1901) is an extensive work in two volumes. Many readers will prefer a briefer book, like Noel and Harold Buxton's "Travel and Politics in Armenia" (Macmillan, 1914), which, with an introduction by Viscount Bryce, and some chapters on Armenian history and culture by Aram Raffi, gives a sketch of conditions before the great war. Another brief work is Archag Tchobanian's "The People of Armenia" (Dent, 1914). More comprehensive is M. C. Garbrielian's "Armenia: a Martyr Nation" (Revell, 1918), with its early history, as well as its chapters on the events of 1915-17.

Three or four books might be grouped under the title of one of them: "The Blackest Page of Modern History" (Putnam, 1916), by Herbert A. Gibbons. These all deal with Armenia and Turkey during the recent war. The others are: A. P. Hacopian's "Armenia and the War" (Doran, 1917?), E. F. Benson's "Crescent and Iron Cross" (Doran, 1918), Lewis Einstein's "Inside Constantinople" (Dutton, 1918), and, of course, "Ambassador Morgenthau's Story" (Doubleday, 1918), by Henry Morgenthau.

A small book, reviewing the whole history of the country, is Bertha S. Papazian's "The Tragedy of Armenia" (Pilgrim Press, 1919), which has been well received in reviews. A pamphlet of Arnold Toynbee's is called "Armenian Atrocities; The Murder of a Nation" (Doran, 1915?); while J. J. Keliher & Co. are the publishers of a pamphlet, dated 1917, and called "Germany, Turkey, and Armenia," which is drawn from documentary evidence. The massacres in the recent war led Helen Davenport Gibbons to write "The Red Rugs of Tarsus" (Century, 1917), a record of the massacre of 1909. Official papers upon this subject are in "The Treatment of Armenians in the Ottoman Empire" (Hodder, 1916). These were documents presented to Viscount Grey, and laid before Parliament as an official paper.

MASSACHUSETTS has shown beyond question where the great body of America's citizenship stands when the foundations of law and order are threatened. The attitude of the two candidates for the governorship took the contest wholly out of the ordinary rut of party politics. In his handling of the police strike, Governor Coolidge stood in the public mind, outside Massachusetts no less than within, as the champion of order against anarchy. Mr. Long, the Democratic candidate, could have done the same. He chose, however, to make his appeal primarily to the elements supposed to have been offended by Governor Coolidge's course, depending upon the radical element in Boston and the manufacturing centres to overbalance the loss which he was sure to suffer in the better element of his own party. The result is a plurality of about 125,000 for Coolidge—a figure almost unprecedented in Massachusetts, and contrasting with his own plurality of only 17,000 against the same opponent a year ago. Boston, where Long's campaign managers were looking for a majority of over 40,000, gave him only about 5,000, showing a heavier Democratic defection than the rest of the State. Democratic candidates for office in Massachusetts will perhaps be a little less eager, in the future, to pick up the red end of the political poker.

IT is a common error to exaggerate the significance of a single electoral victory; but there are times when failure to recognize such significance argues not caution but blindness. The Massachusetts result is absolutely conclusive, and on a question far more comprehensive than the immediate issue upon which it turned. It is conclusive as to the state of mind of the American people on the whole programme of revolutionary radicalism. If our historic form of government were on its last legs, if the existing economic and social order were ready to be thrown into the scrap-heap, an appeal to the abstract principle of law and order, however well grounded, could not possibly evoke such a response. People who are in a state of revolutionary discontent are not in a frame of mind to draw distinctions. They hit a head when they see it. No better opportunity could possibly have been presented than this contest between Coolidge and Long for registering a protest against the existing order. If the people were seething with the revolutionary spirit, neither the specific issue of the moment nor party attachments of the past would have stood in the way of its expression. But all the breaking of party lines was of precisely the opposite character. The Republican ranks have stood firm, and scores of thousands of Democratic voters have swelled them. At a single stroke, Massachusetts has disposed of the notion that the voice either of the soap-box agitator or of the dilettante revolutionist is the voice of America.

ONLY the transcendent interest of the Massachusetts victory puts the result of the New York city election into second place. The overwhelming victory of Justice Newburger is such a blow as Tammany has seldom suffered; the rescue from its grip of leading posts in the municipal government is hardly less important to the public, and is even more of a disappointment to Tammany's expectations. That the citizenship of New York could be aroused to such a pitch upon local questions, at a time when bigger troubles so engross the public mind, is matter for special satisfaction. It contributes its share, too, toward showing that the American people are not so taken up with rainbow-chasing that the old concerns of ordinary decent government are regarded by them as of no consequence. It would be foolish, however, to regard the outcome of the campaign as proving anything more than that there are limits to what Tammany can count upon; the overwhelming defeat of Mayor Mitchel two years ago—with Hylan the victor!—will long remain a monumental warning of the abyssal possibilities of New York City's vote.

THE President heartily congratulates Governor Coolidge on his victory, and the country heartily congratulates the President on his congratulation.

CONGRESS has shown bad judgment in refusing to the Air Service, so far, even a living appropriation, to say nothing of provision for progress. The outbreak of the war found aviation in its infancy, even in Germany. Speedy progress was made, in all the more important countries involved, but it was progress under the lash of immediate war necessity. The admitted faults that exist in the planes in use to-day are in no small degree due to this unavoidable lack of time for careful tests of each new feature as it was evolved, and the thorough working out of underlying principles. Now that the lash has been removed, the time has come for the slow and careful revision of all that was so hastily done, that structural defects may be removed, dangers to life and limb minimized, and the various forms of aircraft be brought to the highest possible level of efficiency for the uses of either war or peace. This work is, of course, going to be done. The immediate question is whether the United States is going to have any part in it other than that of standing on the ground and watching the improved planes of more enterprising countries as they glide by.

When once the country realizes the situation, it will not tolerate a policy so lacking in national self-respect. But the loss of a year or two in getting into the game would be a very serious misfortune. It will mean at the outset that many of the most desirable men now in the service, on both the practical and the scientific sides, will leave it for other occupations. The class of air men who will consent to stay and merely mark time, in the hope of more liberal support in some indefinite future, is not the class from which genuine progress in the art and science of aviation is to be expected. The really live men can be held only if new planes are to be built and ample laboratory room and equipment provided for the working out of the scientific problems still unsolved. It would be entirely unjustifiable to permit this loss merely because the question is still pending whether or not to reorganize the Air Service as a separate Department. Reorganization will be made none the more difficult by the existence of something really worth while to reorganize. The present session of Congress should not adjourn without granting at least the $15,000,000 appropriation for new work which has already passed the Senate but was cancelled by the Conference Committee in deference to the House.

THE failure of Yudenitch to take Petrograd brings into relief again the question of the blockade of Soviet Russia. Few topics have been the subject of more misinformation or more misplaced emotion. On Saturday last the League of Free Nations Association held a luncheon for discussing it and a large portion of the meeting was devoted to impassioned appeals to end it. The parlor Bolshevik element present was particularly vigorous in the expression of its feelings.

Such people, however, are not especially concerned with facts. In the first place, it is not America's blockade. In the second place, the blockade of Soviet Russia is now the blockade of Petrograd alone, for active fighting is taking place on all the remaining frontiers, and the question of blockade does not arise on the fighting line. In the third place, the lifting of the blockade by the Allies might rescue the people of Petrograd if the Bolsheviks would not seize the supplies for themselves and the Red Army, but they have consistently refused to permit the bringing in of any supplies under neutral auspices that would safeguard them.

Russia could not be fed from the outside even if there were no barrier at all, for there are a hundred million mouths and transportation has broken down. Russia must feed herself, and she has in her country districts enough food to do so, but it is the crowning crime of the Bolshevik Government that it has made this impossible. The blockade, throughout the period of the armistice, has simply exposed the incompetence and lack of constructive ability of the fools and criminals who promised the deluded people a communistic Utopia. It was not a blockade of a country that depended on import of food and raw materials, but of a land abounding in every natural resource. Had there been in the Bolshevik leaders the slightest ability to construct, it would have served as a powerful stimulus to develop the utilization of these resources, like a high protective tariff. No better example of this incompetence need be cited than that of Petrograd freezing to death and tearing down its wooden dwellings for fuel, while surrounded by forests. In reality, the question of the blockade itself is far less important than the source and the purpose of the agitation against it—an agitation which bears all the marks of a propaganda to arouse sympathy for the Bolsheviks and to block the efforts to assist the real Russia.

FUGITIVES who have recently escaped from Bolshevik Russia bring some valuable information as to the developments there. The Red Army is under iron discipline and the people are utterly cowed and terrorized. There has not been the slightest display of constructive ability, and production is at a standstill. It is estimated that more than forty thousand German soldiers and five hundred officers are serving in the Bolshevik armies, and this accounts for a degree of organization not to have been expected from the Bolsheviks themselves.

Another phenomenon has been pointed out by a prominent Moscow industrialist who has just escaped through the South after having served a term as a conscript in the Red Army. This phenomenon should be of especial interest to the radicals of the labor movement in this country who have been lauding the Russian dictatorship of the proletariat. He points out that, whereas the revolution developed in the industrial classes Socialistic ideas which led to seizure of factories by the workmen, voting by them of their own hours and wages, and the general disappearance of any ideas of discipline or authority in industry, the Bolshevik régime with an iron hand has absolutely swept these ideas out of existence. The slightest expression of dissatisfaction on the part of a laborer is repressed with ruthless cruelty. Workmen are shot down in batches for the least infraction of rules. Industrialists have feared that reconstruction would be sadly hampered by the difficulty of dealing with labor under the conditions produced by revolution and Socialist agitation, but apparently the Soviet tyranny has destroyed the last vestige of independence in the Russian laboring classes.

ACCORDING to cable messages, the gist of Premier Clémenceau's speech in Strassburg, on Tuesday, may be summed up in the one word, "work," directed not merely to his own people, but to the entire world. The loss of four years of destructive warfare can be made up by work alone. There had been predictions that Clémenceau would come out with a demand for a revision of the treaty of peace, giving France more ample protection against the possibility of renewed attack by Germany, but he prefers to trust in the continued friendship of England and America who, he said, had not bargained for their blood and would not grudge help to France. The necessity of getting back to work, which the French Premier stressed so heavily, is the burden of a letter from the John V. Farwell Company, of Chicago, which appeared in one of the New York papers on the same day. The Farwell Company urges the immediate ratification of the treaty, with no destructive reservations, as an imperative necessity if the people of Europe are to be got back to work, an end which can be gained only with a supply of raw materials, machinery, and credits which will not be given until after the ratification of the treaty. The opinion is also expressed that the treaty delay, by preventing the laboring class from getting to work, is adding to the forces of extreme radicalism everywhere, and that if prolonged it will seriously depress all lines of American business.

IN Germany as here, the feeling grows that the labor class is being used by strike leaders to bring about a Bolshevistic revolution. This opinion was expressed the other day by Fritz Neuhaus, director-general of the Borsig Locomotive and Machine Works, in an interview with the correspondent of the New York Times. The Borsig concern, along with other great metal-working establishments, has granted increase of wages, with the eight-hour day, and other concessions; but new demands have followed repeated concessions, until Director Neuhaus is convinced that the leaders are prolonging the present strike not for the sake of labor but in the hope that the Government may be overthrown, and a Spartacan dictatorship put in its place. He is convinced, however, that their aims will be thwarted by rebellion among their own followers, who are unwilling to continue in enforced idleness and see their families suffering, with no funds from which strike pay may be provided, and no share in the Government allowance to those who are involuntarily unemployed. The Borsig establishment has large orders, and would be working day and night, with an increased force, if not held up by the strike. Director Neuhaus also states that in some industries the workmen themselves, with the consent of their unions, have gone back to piece-work and working overtime in order to counteract the disadvantages of a rigid adherence to the eight-hour rule.

THE economy to be expected from a national budget system is something more fundamental than a mere reduction in the grand total of Congressional appropriations, which might not be economy at all. An appropriation of a million for some great reclamation project might conceivably be wasteful, while the granting of five times as much would have been true economy. The million might be so scanty that costly work already in progress would suffer serious deterioration through want of funds to carry it to completion, while the larger sum would have placed the entire project in position to yield important economic advantages to the country. The real gain from a rightly organized budget system in our national finances will come first through securing a fairer distribution of the total of appropriations among the various Departments. A comprehensive view of the entire field, and the relation of its parts to one another, will take the place of the present struggle of rival interests, each seeking all it can get for itself and none well informed as to the legitimate claims of the others.

IN an official letter to the Chairman of the Senate Military Committee, Assistant Secretary of State Philip says that the United States is maintaining no "blockade" of Petrograd but is simply refusing export licenses for shipments to Russian territory under Bolshevik control, and clearance papers to American vessels seeking to enter Petrograd, the only remaining Bolshevik port. This refusal is placed on two grounds, the declared purpose of the Bolsheviks to carry revolution into other lands, and the Bolshevik "nationalization" of all trade, which makes it impossible to distribute even necessities through Petrograd except by dealing with the Bolshevik authorities. The stores of American food placed in Viborg, Finland, by the American Relief Commission, will be taken to Petrograd "whenever that city may come under the control of authorities with whom it is possible to deal." Assistant Secretary Phillips reminds the Committee that this action is taken by the Administration under its war powers, and cannot be maintained after the ratification of the Peace Treaty without new legislation. As the opening up of commerce with territory under Bolshevik control would unquestionably furnish new channels for the inflow of revolutionary propaganda, Congress should at once enact such empowering legislation as may seem necessary.

GERMANY will doubtless accept without a murmur the Allies' bill of damages on account of the ships-of-war scuttled at Scapa Flow. What are a few millions of marks on top of so many billions? It was worth the price, this splendid vindication of the honor of the High Seas fleet—the very poetry of the art of sinking. From the point of view of the Allies, of course, leaving out of account all question of good manners at sea, so flagrant a breach of the armistice terms could not be blinked.

IN the course of his evidence before the National Assembly Sub-Committee Dr. von Bethmann-Hollweg, the German ex-Chancellor, made a statement which implied the nation's responsibility for the relentless submarine warfare. He had been opposed to that weapon, he declared, but the influence of Admiral von Tirpitz, General Ludendorff, and Field Marshal von Hindenburg, was so strong that the German people were absolutely convinced of its justification and followed their military leaders blindly. If public opinion in Germany was as futile as Mr. Wilson supposed in his speech of April 2, 1917, the submarine warfare would have needed no sanction of the people to be carried into effect. The three criminal fire-eaters would have started on their wicked course regardless of any opinion but their own. The chancellor tried to attenuate the guilt with which he charged the nation by adding that it followed the triumvirate blindly. If this is true, as it evidently is, the fault lies with Dr. von Bethmann-Hollweg and his like, whose clear duty it was to open the people's eyes. Of this another confession of the Chancellor gives an interesting proof: Having been asked why the Central Powers made their peace offer on December 12, 1916, in spite of the fact that a move for peace by Mr. Wilson had been suggested to Germany and was likely to be initiated before the end of that month, Dr. von Bethmann-Hollweg replied that "in order not to give the impression of weakness the German peace offer had to come at a time when our military successes were at the highest. Moreover, it was necessary to show the German people that the Government desired peace and was only waging a defensive war." The implication is that this desire could not be made apparent when it came to actual negotiations, as then the peace-loving government of Dr. von Bethmann-Hollweg would have to confess that the aim of its defensive war was the annexation of Belgium. If the people were really deceived as to the intentions of their rulers, they furnished an amazing instance of gregarious blindness; but this does not lessen the sin of the ex-Chancellor and other non-military leaders who, in obedience to orders from army headquarters, took advantage of the nation's lack of sight for the furtherance of Ludendorff's schemes.

IT may be only an omen, and probably of no more significance than usually attaches to omens, that the new list of Rhodes scholars is headed by the name of William Dwight Whitney. Some seventy years ago a young scholar of that name set sail for—Berlin. What he got there plus what he brought with him sufficed to make his name one of the brightest in the bead-roll of American scholars. Through him and others like him we acquired something which in justice both to ourselves and to Germany should not be forgotten. The horror of the last five years has far more than cancelled our debt to Germany; and the fact that we had allowed the debt to roll up far higher than it should have been permitted to go tends to encourage a denial that there was any debt at all. But for better and worse we got a great deal. Whatever was good in it, and there was much that was good, ought by this time to have been made thoroughly our own. It should be judged not on grounds of whence it came but of what it has become. From the original source, however, we need at present nothing more, and our young scholars do well to look elsewhere for new learning to graft upon the now pretty sturdy American stock.

THESE are times which try men's minds, quite as much as their souls. The world, as never before, needs head. It asks for knowledge, not anodynes; facts, not dreams; light, and not a suffused rosy glow. But light, if it is to illuminate, must fall on a seeing eye. People—huge masses of them—are perfectly well aware of this. They are ready, eager, to study, to be informed where they were content to be ignorant, to be receptive where they were comfortably indifferent. They know well enough that salvation comes, if it comes, through a very considerable lifting of the plane, a considerable enrichment of the materials, upon which the world's saving common sense works. Any single effort to contribute to the satisfaction of this need must appear small in view of the ends contemplated. It is only the sum of many such efforts that begins to look respectable, but each of many small contributions shares in the dignity of the sum that depends on them for its existence. It is, therefore, gratifying to the Review to feel that its column, "Books and the News," is successfully serving the limited though highly practical ends it aims at.

The Country and the Miners

THE sullen obstinacy of the United Mine Workers has been met by the Administration at Washington with a manifestation of energy and firmness never surpassed in a similar emergency. The President's offer to bring about an orderly settlement was accompanied by the clearest possible warning that if such settlement was refused all the powers of the Federal Government would be put into action for the protection of the rights of the public. The offer was rejected and the warning ignored; and with a swiftness and completeness that leaves no room for doubt as to the determination behind it, all the machinery of the law and all the activities of its thousands of agents have been set in motion to bring to nought the defiant attempt of the union to take the country by the throat and compel acceptance of its arbitrary and unreasonable demands.

In the struggle before it, whether that shall prove short or long, the Administration has the overwhelming support of public sentiment. In all the history of labor struggles, it would be hard to recall a single instance in which, from the very outset of a strike, the public were so distinctly arrayed against the strikers. Usually it is not until the cause of the strikers has become discredited by flagrant acts of violence that the people at large are aroused to resentment against them. In this instance, the inherent wrongfulness of the strike has been sufficient to bring about an instant alignment of the public against it.

A number of circumstances have combined to create this state of feeling. In the first place, the odium of refusing to have their case submitted to fair inquiry and arbitration rests squarely upon the miners. As Attorney-General Palmer says in his official statement of the Government's position: "The operators, upon the insistence of the President, indicated their willingness to negotiate and arbitrate, providing the strike is deferred, while the miners rejected the President's request for arbitration as a means of settlement and refused to defer the strike." This of itself would be a heavy weight for the strikers to carry. But refusal to arbitrate is, in this instance, a thousand-fold more reprehensible than usual, because what the miners propose to substitute for inquiry and arbitration is the coercion of the whole people of the country, through the deliberate stoppage of its industrial life. The fight is not against the operators, but against the people; if the strike is won, it will be not because the operators yield, but because the people surrender, and the people don't intend to surrender.

But there is a third factor in the situation which, we believe, is quite as powerful as either of these in arraying the people of the country against the miners. It requires no close examination of the facts to recognize in this strike something far beyond an ordinary attempt to better conditions. The question of recognition of the union is not involved at all; it is with the union that the operators have been dealing for years. The situation as to wages and hours is not of such a character as to account for uncompromising insistence on an arbitrary and extreme demand, in the face of repeated appeals by the Government for a reasonable method of settlement. The country feels instinctively that the fight which the miners have thus deliberately provoked centers about an issue more vital than any involved in their immediate demands, unreasonable as these are. The country realizes that the strike is, in essence, revolutionary; that it asserts the right of the workers who at any given time happen to be engaged in any essential industry, to absolute control, and virtual ownership, of that industry. Thus the alignment that is taking place upon this strike is at bottom an alignment of those who favor, as against those who oppose, a movement which attacks the very foundations of the existing order.

The same issue has arisen more sharply, though not in a field so extensive, in more than one instance within the past few months. It appeared in a gross and violent form at Seattle, and was triumphantly met by Mayor Ole Hanson, whose splendid conduct in the crisis instantly made him a national figure. In a still simpler form—because it was not in the field of industry, but in the even more essential province of the primary functions of government—the issue was made in the Boston police strike; and Governor Coolidge met it with a conclusive and masterly assertion of the supremacy of law and government. In each of these instances the man upon whom the responsibility of government rested showed himself equal to the occasion; and now, in a case less absolutely clear-cut, but no less vital, and in its dimensions infinitely more serious, the Federal Administration has acquitted itself in a manner worthy of its high trust. Americans who have feared that the foundations of their institutions were in danger may well take heart as they contemplate the fidelity, and courage, and strength which their public servants have shown when put to the test.

damental soundness of spirit of the nation as a whole. In a Congress in which party division is unusually acute, with a Senate that has been engaged for months in a contest of exceptional bitterness between Administration and anti-Administration forces, and with a Presidential campaign in near prospect, this coal-strike issue was met, from the moment it came into view, in a spirit of almost unanimous harmony. From the start everybody knew that Congress would stand behind the President when the crisis came; and when it did come the Senate immediately passed a concurrent resolution giving "the national Administration and all others in authority the assurance of our constant, continuous, and unqualified support in the use of such constitutional and lawful means as may be necessary to meet the present industrial emergency and in vindicating the majesty and power of the Government in enforcing obedience to and respect for the Constitution and the laws."

There can be no doubt that the attitude of Congress is a reflection of what is silently going on in men's minds all over the country. One interesting indication of this was given when the Association of Men Teachers and Principals of the City of New York, at a special meeting, unanimously adopted a resolution that the Board of Education be petitioned to give the teachers permission to volunteer for service in the coal fields without loss of pay. One often has occasion to lament the readiness of Congress to keep its ear to the ground; but there are times when that trait has its uses. Congress may play to this gallery or that in lesser matters; but when it comes to an issue which the whole people feel to be vital, the gallery it plays to—if it plays to a gallery at all—is the whole people, and nothing less. For many months the revolutionaries, professional and amateur, have been occupying a big place on the stage; they are now being shown how small a place they fill in the country.

The Strike and the Law

THE Government's case against the coal strikers rests upon no doubtful or narrow ground. The facts and circumstances which Attorney-General Palmer marshals in his public statement of the Government's position are but the background of the case, and no one of them is essential to its validity. The law invoked by him as the basis of the Government's action is the Food and Fuel Control act. This act, as the Attorney-General says, "made it unlawful for any concerted action, agreement, or arrangement to be made by two or more persons to limit the facilities of transportation and production, or to restrict the supply and distribution of fuel, or to aid or abet the doing of any act having this purpose or effect. Making a strike effective under the circumstances which I have described amounts to such concerted action or arrangement." Nor is there the slightest doubt that this act is still in full force. The date of its expiration is unambiguously stated in the act itself, which declares that it "shall cease to be in effect when the existing state of war between the United States and Germany shall have terminated, and the fact and date of such termination shall be ascertained and proclaimed by the President."

In the newspapers, while the strike was incubating, the greatest stress was laid on the charge that the miners were flagrantly repudiating a contract obligation. But neither in the President's letter nor in the Attorney-General's statement does this charge play a prominent part. On the contrary, while the point is mentioned in both cases, it is touched upon with conspicuous gentleness. Whether the obligation of that agreement, which was to be valid "during the continuation of the war," should be regarded as absolutely binding at this time is obviously an open question. The miners would have been perfectly justified in asserting their view that the obligation no longer holds good. The odium that rests upon them, in this regard, is not their assertion of the view, but their assumption of the right to compel its acceptance by force, instead of submitting the question to fair and impartial determination. But the Government's case in no wise depends on the right or wrong of this particular claim. The miners cannot pretend that they have a right to repeal an act of Congress; and under the Food and Fuel Control act a strike of the kind that is now being attempted would be absolutely illegal, even if no contract had been entered into in regard to wages and working conditions.

A larger question as to the Government's power is raised by a speech made by ex-President Taft in Massachusetts. Every one who thinks seriously about what the strike really means must ask himself whether our protection against the disaster which it threatens rests solely on the accident that peace has not yet been proclaimed. If the Treaty had been ratified last month and the proclamation of peace issued, the condition of the country would still be essentially what it is to-day, and the peril in which our industries and the general welfare would be placed by the strike would be no less than it is now. Mr. Taft placed the right of the Government to protect the public in such a contingency upon a basis which has nothing to do with the existence of a state of war. He said:

In an ordinary strike incidental annoyance to the public, which is negligible, does not render the strike illegal. But when enormous combinations of workmen deliberately enter upon a country-wide plan to take the country by the throat and compel the country to compel the employers in that particular field of industry to yield to the demands of the men, they are engaged in an unlawful conspiracy. The sacredness of their individual right to labor on such terms as they choose and to leave their employment when they will does not protect or justify them in such a conspiracy.

That is the kind of conspiracy the bituminous coal miners propose to begin on the first day of November. Congress has full power, in the interstate commerce law, to condemn such a conspiracy as an offense, if it has not already done so.

The issue thus brought forward is one that may well engage the attention of our highest legislative and juristic authorities. And the public at large must begin to consider in real earnest the question of what power the nation possesses to defend itself against what is in all essentials an act of war. We cannot afford to drift along in a state of uncertainty upon so vital an issue. The specific legislation proposed in the Cummins Railroad bill to prevent the possibility of our means of transportation being paralyzed by a strike is bitterly opposed by organized labor. Still more opposition will there be to legislation covering dangers of less definite scope, but no less menacing to the vital interests of the country. Yet if the future is to be safe, the power of the national Government to intervene for the nation's protection must in one way or another be made plain. And there is no better time than the present for facing the issue.

Bessarabia

EVER since Rumania, on August 18, 1916, signed a secret treaty with the Allies which promised satisfaction of her claims in Austro-Hungarian territory, in exchange for her armed intervention on the side of the Entente, she has caused her associates more trouble and annoyance than the maintenance of her neutrality would have done. Within two years of that date, on March 5, 1918, General Averescu was forced to agree to a preliminary peace with the Central Powers, which was signed in so-called permanent form two months later. But when the fortune of war had turned against the victors, and after the exit of Austria-Hungary, she, at the eleventh hour, resumed her campaign on November 10, 1918, obviously in order to safeguard the satisfaction of her territorial ambitions as promised to her by the secret treaty of 1916. There is no evidence that the Great Powers have taken the view that by her incidental peace with the enemy Rumania had put that treaty out of operation, but one gets the impression, from the defiant attitude which M. Bratiano's Government has adopted towards the Supreme Council, that at Bucharest the Council is suspected or actually accused of taking that position. This would account for Rumania's determination to take the law in her own hands with regard to the settlement of affairs in Hungary.

Her claims to Bessarabia have a stronger foundation than a provision in a secret treaty whose validity is subject to doubt. The exit of Russia from the war gave Rumania an opportunity to present these claims, which she bases on historical and ethnical grounds. For the land between Pruth and Dniester, until it was annexed by Russia in 1812, has always formed an integral part of Moldavia, and at least 50 per cent.—according to Rumanian statistics nearly 70 per cent.—of the Bessarabian population are Moldavian in race and in language. From 1812 until 1917, except for an interval of twenty years from 1856 to 1877, the country remained under Russian rule. But when the revolution led to the disintegration of the Empire, Bessarabia was left to her own control. She would seem to have soon grown tired of autonomy, to judge from the vote which was passed, some time ago, by the National Convention in favor of incorporation with Rumania. Whether this assembly was truly representative, however, has been called into question—not, indeed, by the Rumanian Government, which naturally bases its recent action on that majority vote, but from the side of the Bessarabians themselves. Rumanian troops were, at that time, in occupation of the country, and seeing how these forces are being used in Hungary in influencing the political situation, there may be some truth in the assertion made by non-Moldavian elements in Bessarabia that the Constitution of the National Parliament did not so much reflect the opinion of the people as the temporary predominance of Rumanian militarism. A plebiscite has been asked for from the Bessarabian side as a corrective of this impugned majority vote. But the Rumanian Government objects, preferring a bird in the hand to two in the bush; and in order to tighten its grip on the catch, it has issued an official proclamation of the union of Bessarabia with Rumania.

The helpless inactivity of the Supreme Council in the Fiume tangle has, no doubt, encouraged M. Bratiano to proceed on his successful course of "realpolitik." The moment is auspicious for Rumania. Her present strength lies in the weakness of both her friends and her enemies: the Entente has greater interests to protect in the Baltic region than are involved in the fate of Bessarabia, and Hungary is in a state of semi-subjection to Rumania, which makes her quite harmless as an opponent. The only danger for Rumania in thus extending her territory as far as the Dniester is in the friction to which it will lead in the future with whatever Russian régime may be established after the overthrow of the Soviet Government. That Bratiano faces this risk may be taken as an indication that, in his opinion, the struggle between the Reds and the anti-revolutionary forces is yet far removed from that final phase which recent dispatches had given reason to regard as at last imminent.

Russia's Plight

IN the Russian situation, the optimism of a fortnight ago has not been justified by the event. It seemed indeed for the moment that the simultaneous movements of the forces of Kolchak, Denikin, and Yudenitch presaged a speedy fall of the Bolshevik régime. But these hopes, at least for the immediate future, seem doomed to disappointment, and the elation of loyal Russians, who felt that the dawn of a new day in their tortured country was at hand, is replaced by a certain degree of pessimism. We in America also have reason to share their disappointment, for it is certain that as long as the collapse of the Bolshevik Government is postponed, by just so much is industrial quiet here and peace in the world at large delayed.

The failure of the anti-Bolshevik forces to drive home their victories to a conclusion does not mean that their opponents have taken on new strength, or that they will be obliged to desist from future attempts. Indeed, the latest reports that have come to hand contain a certain degree of reassurance. They have suffered too often from disappointment to allow the latest reverses to affect seriously their fighting morale. The trouble lies rather in another direction. The Bolshevik forces, although well disciplined and possessing interior lines, are not stronger, but there is exposed in the anti-Bolshevik forces a weakness in organization back of the line that grows more serious as decisive victory is delayed.

It now seems evident that Yudenitch, in undertaking his drive on Petrograd, counted on coöperation and support from certain elements and that these failed him at the critical moment. It is scarcely probable that he would have attempted to take the well garrisoned and strongly fortified city with but a mere handful of ill-trained troops, unless he had the assurance that a movement of the Finnish Army from the north would assail Petrograd from the other side and complete the investment of the city. Finnish assistance, however, was dependent upon complicated political considerations. In the first place, Finnish national aspirations had to be satisfied. To be sure, Admiral Kolchak's declaration in this regard was definite and satisfactory. But the Finns are in a position where they hesitate to accept at full value promises whose fulfillment in fact must depend to some extent on the attitude of future governments and be subject in some degree to future international adjustments. Besides this the Finns have recently made additional demands of a territorial and financial character that are almost prohibitive.

Denikin, almost within striking distance of Moscow, has been obliged to give ground and lose the impetus of his remarkable swing to the north. This does not indicate so much a recrudescence of Bolshevik power as it does an unsatisfactory condition back of his own lines. The same is true of the slowing up, and even the loss of a considerable stretch of the railroad, in Kolchak's recent drive. The conditions that have brought about this situation on both Siberian and South Russian fronts deserve examination. The reader who follows the newspaper accounts notes on the one hand the enthusiasm with which the armies of Kolchak and Denikin were welcomed by the people whom they liberated from the Bolshevik yoke, and on the other hand the growing dissatisfaction and unrest within the liberated territories, and jumps to the conclusion that this unrest is due to some feeling that these leaders represent reactionary sentiment. The truth is that there is a fundamental difficulty facing the anti-Bolshevik leaders which is well-nigh insuperable. In both cases, all efforts have been centred on the front. The result is that it has not been possible to reorganize the economic life of the liberated regions and restore to these populations the civil administration and prosperity necessary to their well-being. Had it been possible to do this, the fronts would have taken care of themselves.

The case of the Kolchak Government is especially difficult. Into Omsk poured thousands of refugees from European Russia, hosts of them being former petty officials. They could not be allowed to starve, and were given administrative positions for which they were incompetent. They would not go out into the country districts and undertake administrative work, but instead clustered about the capital engaging in petty intrigues and devoting themselves to their own selfish interests. Could there have been a proper development of production and transportation in Siberia, the resultant prosperity would have provided a sound basis for the stability of the Omsk Government. The failure of the Allies and America to realize this and to take the necessary steps to bring it about has been their greatest sin of omission in dealing with the Russian problem.

The same is true of the regions occupied by Denikin. Here are perhaps forty million people occupying a territory in which are located the bulk of Russia's immediately available natural resources. Denikin has not only been unable to restore economic life and prosperity to these regions, but has been obliged to appoint as Governors of provinces and districts old generals and officials who are utterly incompetent to deal with the problems of administration in an enlightened manner, and helpless to meet the active agitation of Bolshevik agents among the population. The result is unrest and disorganization, one phase of which is seen in the appearance of numerous bands of outlaws and robbers, pursuing their depredations in various parts of the country. If the Allies and America could but realize that the immediate starting of commercial and industrial enterprises throughout this region would stabilize conditions and do more to restore Russia and bring peace to the world than the dispatch of a possible military force, they would certainly take the necessary steps to encourage such enterprise.

The anti-Bolshevik campaigns of Kolchak and Denikin were undertaken with the idea of sweeping forward rapidly, capturing Moscow, and then undertaking the organization of Russia from the centre. Consequently, all attention was concentrated on the front, and the rear perforce neglected. But the campaigns have suffered delay and disappointment, and the general plans must be revised in consequence. The whole question of whether the Bolsheviks can be overthrown and Russia restored by the present movements depends upon whether the leaders are able to make the readjustments and organize the occupied territories. There is a dearth of able and unselfish men for these tasks, and seeming inability on the part of the Allies to realize their importance. Meanwhile the sufferings of the Russian people are increasing to a point that staggers the imagination. The time has come for the Allies to adopt a positive policy—a policy directed to the relieving of an intolerable situation and the averting of an unparalleled catastrophe.

Where the Farmer Draws the Line

IT is not strange that our advance agents of a "proletariat" revolution have imagined the American farm to be good soil for the growth of their propaganda. Imagination ballasted by a bounteous lack of knowledge is capable of greater feats than that. But even people whose mental path keeps nearer to the ground of fact are sometimes a little uneasy as to the part which the farmer might play in the general industrial "hold-up" of organized society which agitators are continually plotting. The farmer is not a conservative from any reasoned-out philosophy of life. He may occasionally follow a long distance in the train of enthusiasts concealing destructive economic or political vagaries under the cloak of fine promises, as in the case of Populism in Kansas a generation ago, or Townleyism in the Northwest just now. He is not instinctively averse to class legislation, so long as it is in favor of his own class; for he shares the persuasion common to so many that his class is after all the backbone of society, and his interests identical with the public good.

But when agitators of the "whatever is wrong" school approach him, a limit to his possible radicalism is very soon disclosed. Among the things that are, in his case, are his farm, paid for by the sweat of his own brow, or perhaps his father's, through long years; the fields of hay and wheat, nearing harvest after months of toil and waiting; his wife, whose economies and counsels have played no small part in the success of his efforts; his sons and daughters, either aiding him on the farm, or away at college, or holding positions of profit and responsibility in the neighboring city, for which they have been fitted by the income of the farm. Whatever is not wrong for him unless it has gone wrong by some mischance not within the normal course of life of the industrious and intelligent American farmer. And so when a new régime is proposed to him which would set a "Mother Jones" or an Emma Goldman on a higher plane of womanhood than that of his own modest wife and daughters, and deny to him and his family any moral right in the accumulated fruits of their toil and saving, there is "nothing doing." The life of the American farm may not be conducive to sustained philosophical thinking on such matters, but it does beget a shrewd common sense. If a farmer lets the brambles of Bolshevism take root in his brain, it is a fairly safe guess that he has first let burdocks and wild carrots take root in the fields where he should have been tending beans and corn—in other words, that he is about as genuine a farmer as the Bolshevistic agitator is a laborer. What real farmers think of the current radical agitation has just been expressed, with lucidity and vigor, in the meetings of the Farmers' National Congress at Hagerstown and of the Illinois Agricultural Association.

Every State in the Union has its tens of thousands of farmers who own their own lands and enjoy the comparatively independent life which the farm secures. They take pride in the character and achievements of their sons and daughters who were born on the farm, were educated from its income, and, if they have left it for other fields of endeavor, are glad on every convenient occasion to come back to it as their "home." And so American farmers as a class will spurn any form of radicalism which strikes at the fundamentals of family life and morality, and the right to provide for one's family in one's own way, through the legally secured ownership and control of property honestly accumulated. And the same is true of a certain proportion of any class of men who earn their living by the work of their hands. Whatever may be truthfully said about American wage conditions, it remains a fact that thousands of wage earners, in all important branches of industry, have found it possible to acquire their own homes, to furnish them comfortably, and to bring up in them families of well-trained children who have given good account of themselves in the schools and colleges and in every walk of life. It is a safe guess that the knowledge of the existence of a considerable element of men of this type is not the least of the reasons why labor agitators show so decided a preference for calling strikes without the formality of free discussion and a yes or no vote on the part of the individual workmen concerned.

Facts such as these suggest an important and promising line of effort to those who are interested in keeping the country free from serious danger of revolution. Congress and the state legislatures should take all proper measures to encourage agriculture and the farm-owning habit, not of course by demagogical class legislation, but by making ample provision for agricultural education, agricultural experiment stations, model farms and other things which will promote the putting into practical and general use of the results of scientific investigation in this field. But the most important desideratum of all can not be supplied by legislation, and that is to make the life of the farming community so attractive on its social side as to hold a larger proportion of the bright country boys and girls who so frequently find in high school and college a pathway to some calling which will open to them the more entertaining life of the city. Some of our legislatures, on advice of incompetent educational theorists, imagine that they can check this loss by making the country school little more than a fitting school for the farm. Such a policy will defeat its own end, and even increase the evil, by sending the brighter farm boys and girls out of their home communities for their elementary education as well as the higher. There should be no attempt in America, even indirectly, to impede the easy passage from one calling to another. But with the cheapening of the automobile, the multiplication of country trolley lines, the improvement of farm roads, the invention of cheap and easily managed electric light and power plants for isolated country homes, the diffusion of telephones, and the spread of rural mail delivery, the problem of a more satisfactory social life on the farm, with a consequent retention of a larger share of well educated farm-born brains for farm use, will surely not be given up as insoluble. Farm houses, in point of comfort and appearance, farm household conveniences, farm sanitation and hygiene, are all involved, and all offer fine fields for those subtler forms of public education which cannot be administered through the schools. A numerous, intelligent and fairly prosperous farm-owning population is so effective a barrier against the more dangerous forms of radical agitation that no effort should be spared to insure its maintenance.

Labor in the Peace Treaty

CAN democracy in America, functioning through the constituted Government, operate more efficiently for the social progress of all the people when unhampered by a political and official alliance with the socialistic movements of Europe, or will it be aided in such efforts by such an alliance? The question is not one for academic debate. It springs inevitably from the frank consideration of some new and very definite facts.

Part Thirteen, captioned "LABOR," Treaty of Peace with Germany (U. S. Senate Document No. 49, to be had on application to your Senator or to the Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C.), establishes a permanent international organization (Article 387) recognized by the Peace Commission as an "Organization of Labor" (Article 386). Membership in the League of Nations carries with it the obligation to appoint representatives in the labor organization (Article 387). This permanent organization of labor is to consist of a General Conference of Representatives of the nations which are members of the League, and an International Labor Office (Article 388). The Conference will meet at least once in every year and may be held oftener if occasion requires. It will be composed of four delegates from each of the nations which are members of the League, two of whom will be Government delegates, appointed by the Government to represent the Government's and the public's interests; a third appointed by the Government but nominated by the employers, and a fourth appointed by the Government but nominated by the working people of the member nation. Provision is made for advisers to the delegates, and where women are affected women advisers may be selected. An adviser may speak in the Conference only upon request of the delegate whom he or she accompanies and on authorization of the President of the Conference, and may not vote; an adviser may be privileged both to speak and vote, however, if acting in the capacity of deputy for his or her delegate. Members (nations) "undertake to nominate non-Government delegates and advisers chosen in agreement with the industrial organizations, if such organizations exist, which are most representative of the employers or work-people, as the case may be, in their respective countries" (Article 389).

In order to comprehend the probable size and make-up of the International Labor organization of the future, one should remember that it will be composed of representatives from the original members of the League of Nations, signatories of the Treaty of Peace; a total of twenty-seven signatory nations, with thirteen states invited to become such, and six that sooner or later will be invited, a grand total of forty-six, which means a conference composed of from one hundred to one hundred and fifty or more delegates (Annex No. 1 to Part 1 of the Treaty of Peace with Germany).

The meetings of the International Labor Conference, with the exception of the first meeting at Washington, will be held at the seat of the League of Nations (Geneva), unless another place be decided upon at a preceding Conference by a two-thirds majority vote of the delegates present (Article 391). The International Labor Office, which is the second and administrative half of the International Organization of Labor set up by the League of Nations, will be established "at the seat of the League of Nations as part of the organization of the League" (Article 392). This office will be controlled by a governing body consisting of twenty-four persons, appointed as follows: Twelve representing the Governments, six elected by the delegates to the Conference representing employers, and six elected by the delegates to the Conference representing the workers. Eight of the twelve persons appointed to represent the Governments on the governing body of the International Labor Office will be nominated by member nations having the greatest industrial importance. If any question arises as to which of the members excel in industrial importance, the matter shall be decided by the Council of the League of Nations. This governing body will elect from its members its own chairman, will regulate its own procedure, and will fix its own times of meeting (Article 393). It will appoint a director of the International Labor Office, who will be responsible for the official conduct of the Office and for the performance of such other duties as may be assigned to him by the governing body (Article 394).

The director will appoint his own staff (Article 395) to carry out the functions of the International Labor Office, which include the "collection and distribution of information on all subjects relating to the international adjustment of conditions in industrial life and labor" and the preparation of the agenda for the meetings of the Conference and the editing and publication in French and in English, and in other languages if the governing body thinks desirable, of "a periodical paper dealing with problems of industry and employment of international interest" (Article 396). The International Labor Office will be entitled to the assistance of the Secretary-General of the League of Nations in any matter in which it can be given (Article 398). Article 7 of the Treaty of Peace specifies, among other things, that "representatives and members of the League and officials of the League when engaged on the business of the League shall enjoy diplomatic privileges and immunities."

The foregoing summary gives a fair idea of the scope and the importance of the proposed International Labor Conference, its close connection with the League of Nations, its prestige because of that close connection, and the efficient machinery that is to be set up to carry out its proceedings. The Conference has power only to recommend to members of the League of Nations the enactment of legislation or approval of treaties, and these recommendations must be approved by a majority of two-thirds of the votes cast by the delegates present; however, "each of the members undertakes that it will, within a period of one year at most from the closing of the session of the Conference, or if it is impossible, owing to exceptional circumstances, to do so within the period of one year, then at the earliest practicable moment and in no case later than eighteen months from the closing of the session of the Conference, bring the recommendation or draft convention before the authority or authorities within whose competency the matter lies, for the enactment of legislation or other action"—hence no member nation may ignore the recommendations of the Conference when these are presented under the terms of the Treaty (Article 405). Provision is also made in the Treaty under Articles 411 and 412 for a Commission of Inquiry to investigate any neglect on the part of any member ratifying any of the conventions or recommendations of the Conference to enforce the provisions thereof, and if found necessary to obtain this enforcement the matter may be referred to the Permanent Court of International Justice of the League of Nations (Article 415), the decision of which shall be final (Article 417).

Any judgment as to the future merits or dangers of the International Labor Organization as created by the Treaty must not be based merely upon the written words, clauses, and articles setting it forth. We must take into consideration, rather, the conditions existing at the time the Treaty was written, and again, the present tendency of the various Governments and their respective national labor movements to accept the principle of nationalization of private capital and industry, or, in other words, Socialism and, in some degree at least, Bolshevism. It is reasonable to assume that if the tendency is now in this direction it will be reflected more and more year by year in the recommendations and proclamations of the International Labor Conference. In every country of industrial importance—except the United States—which is likely to have influential representation in these Conferences the trade union movements are strongly Socialistic.

In July of this year there met at Amsterdam delegates representing the trade union movements of the various European nations and the United States with the purpose of reorganizing the International Trade Union Congress. This purpose was effected. On nomination by Mr. Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labor, Mr. W. A. Appleton, Secretary of the Confederation of British Trades Unions, was elected President of the International Trade Union Congress, succeeding Carl Legien, of Germany, who was President of the Congress at the time of the outbreak of the World War. According to an historical survey of the proceedings of the Amsterdam meeting, published in the Democrat of London, edited by Mr. Appleton, immediately after the adjournment of the convention the delegates reassembled into an international Socialist convention in which all countries, with the exception of the United States, were represented by the same men who made up the International Trade Union Congress. According to the same article, the Congress adopted a resolution, binding upon all members, which set up as the objective of the International Labor Conference to be held under the auspices of the League of Nations the programme of the International Trade Union Conference that had been held early in 1919 at Berne, Switzerland. In this connection it is interesting to note that the American Labor Movement was not represented at the Berne Conference. It is also just as interesting to note further that the International Trade Union Conference of 1919 declared that an International Parliament of Labor should be set up by the League of Nations with power and authority to issue not only international conventions with the binding force of law behind them, but also international laws which, immediately upon adoption, should have the same force, legally, as national laws in all nations.

The so-called labor-capital problem, said to be the greatest problem now before the various peoples of the world, is, in the opinion of the writer, not the question at issue at all, for, while there are some differences between what we call labor, meaning thereby the manual wage workers of our country, and so-called capital, better described as the management in industry, few if any of these differences are irreconcilable, particularly in the United States. The real question at issue can be more properly described as being the irreconcilable difference between capitalism and Socialism and the more extreme form of Socialism commonly described as Bolshevism, which had its genesis in the teachings and doctrines of Socialism. It therefore appears that the question to be considered is not a labor-capital question in the commonly accepted sense. It might better be put thus: Will the International Labor Conference and its machinery, as a part of the League of Nations, function so as actually to bring labor and industrial management in America into a closer understanding, assuring justice to each without destroying either, or will it function to advance the doctrines and the cause of Socialism, Syndicalism, or even extreme Bolshevism?

We have shown that the International Trade Union Congress, lately adjourned in Amsterdam, declared for the Berne programme, one which was largely Socialistic and inclined in some matters toward Bolshevism. It might be helpful to examine the attitude of the principal Governments toward the most vital contention made by the Berne Conference; namely, the right of the workers in an International Parliament to promulgate decrees having the force of international law, binding on all countries members of the League of Nations. On June 1 of this year Acting Secretary of State Long made public through the press the German note on International Labor, together with the note of the Allied Governments in reply, protesting against the arrangements made by the Peace Commission for an international organization of labor under the League of Nations. The German Peace Delegation in this note said: "In the opinion of the German Democratic Government the final decision in questions of labor law and labor protection belongs to the workers themselves." In another place in the same note the delegation said: "According to the resolutions of the International Trade Union Conference at Berne, the International Parliament of Labor is to issue not only international conventions with legal binding force, but also international laws which, from the moment of their adoption, are to have the same effect (legally binding force) as national laws (Proclamations to the workers of all countries adopted by the International Trade Union Conference at Berne, 1919, at the motion of Jouhaux, the delegate from France). The draft of the German Democratic Government endorses this resolution and makes the passing of such laws depend on the assent of four-fifths of the nations represented." [Italics are ours.]

The reply of the Allied and Associated Governments, dated May 31, and signed by President Clémenceau of the Peace Commission, is quite as noteworthy for its seeming rejection in toto of the contentions of the German Government. Section 1 of Premier Clémenceau's reply, which, of course, was approved by our own representative, President Wilson said, in part: "The Allied institutions hold it to be their duty to collaborate with labor in the formulation of such laws, but the laws must be passed upon by representatives of the whole community." Further in his note (Section 5) Premier Clémenceau says, however: "The Labor Commission, moreover, set up by the Peace Conference envisaged all of the points mentioned in your letter as coming within the scope of the Labor Organization." Section 6 of the same note reads, in part: "It [the Labor Commission] also adopted a resolution (copy annexed) in favor of the organization being given power as soon as possible to pass resolutions possessing the force of international law. International labor laws cannot at present be made operative merely by resolutions passed at Conferences. The workers of one country are not prepared to be bound in all matters by laws imposed on them by representatives of other countries; international conventions as provided for under the Peace Treaty are, therefore, at present more effective than international labor laws, for the enforcement of which no penal sanctions can be applied." In Annex No. 2 of the Allied note here referred to Premier Clémenceau transmits to the German delegation a copy of the resolution referred to by him in the first sentence of Section 6 of his note. The resolution reads: "The Commission expresses the hope that as soon as it may be possible an agreement will be arrived at between the high contracting parties with a view to endowing the International Labor Conference under the auspices of the League of Nations with power to make, under conditions to be determined, resolutions possessing the force of international law."

The underscoring of the words "at present," appearing twice in Section 6 of the note quoted, is our own. The repetition of the words leaves the impression that probably in the future the principle adopted at the Berne Conference and approved by the German Democratic Government might be brought into full acceptance through the League of Nations and its International Labor Conference. It leaves one to assume that when the Labor Commission, headed by Mr. Gompers, whose colleague from America was Mr. E. N. Hurley, adopted the resolution expressing the hope that the High Contracting Parties would as soon as possible endow the International Labor Conference with power to pass resolutions possessing the force of International Law, they, the Commission, possibly had some ground for belief that Messrs. Clémenceau, Wilson, Lloyd George, and others felt kindly toward their aspirations and hopes on this point and might be expected to help toward their realization.

Examination of the social currents in European nations leads to no other belief than that the trade union movements of these countries are fast becoming anti-capital and pro-Socialist. It is more than probable that a majority of the delegates elected by and from the various countries to sit in the International Conferences of Labor will be temperamentally so constituted. While it is true that the programme of each meeting of the Conference is set in advance, and that any Government may object to any item of the agenda, it is also true that the governing body of the International Labor Office determines the agenda from year to year. It is further true that regardless of any Government's objection to any item on the agenda the Conference may, by two-thirds vote, set the objection aside and consider the item at another time at their own discretion, in which case even the protesting Government is bound under the treaty obligations to present any recommendation which has been adopted to its National Congress or Parliament. As an example, British labor has declared for the nationalization of coal mines. The International Labor Conference could arrange for a discussion of the subject at a coming meeting, and upon approval of the principle by two-thirds of the delegates voting in a conference our Government and every other Government represented in the League would be forced under the treaty obligations to place the matter before Congress; and the full force of all the machinery of the International Labor Office, with its world-wide publication, its scores of expert advisers and statisticians, could be placed behind the campaign for adoption. In the same way our Government could be forced to put before Congress the question of waiving the right to participate in the passage of international or even national labor laws and of conferring all its rights in the matter upon the International Labor Conference. These matters not only are important to so-called capital, but, it may be assumed, are of vital import to American working people of all sorts.

One provision of the Treaty in particular can easily operate to the end that independent alliances may be formed among the various groups of labor and employers which may be in competition with America for foreign trade and markets. We refer to Article 407, which says, "If any convention coming before the Conference for final consideration fails to secure the support of two-thirds of the delegates present, it shall nevertheless be within the rights of any of the members of the permanent organization to agree to such conventions among themselves." Thus would be afforded ample opportunity for various balances of industrial power to be struck between nations contending for trade and economic advantages, since nations will always so contend among themselves. It must never be forgotten that America is the richest of all nations and it is human to be envious of wealth. While it is true that the League of Nations seeks through its machinery to prevent political combinations of Governments, it would appear that it is affording an official channel through which industrial and economic combinations may be made under the guise of social and labor betterments. This aside, it would appear from the foregoing that a remarkable opportunity is furnished by the Treaty for the dissemination over the surface of the earth of the doctrines of Socialism. The documents will be paid for (and stamped with their implied approval, at least) by the capitalistic nations of the world. It would appear that America must, in the nature of things, be forced to go Europe's way; it can hardly maintain American methods in its search for reformatory measures.

It is true that the Labor Commission set up by the Peace Commission did, with a world of detail, seek to surround the International Labor Conference with safeguards and checks that would prevent that which we have described; but it is equally true, and this is based on the experience and history of the past, that any body of men formed into a conference or assembly or parliament or bureau and given certain legislative, administrative, or judicial powers seeks untiringly and unceasingly to develop and enlarge those powers, and fights bitterly any attempt that is made to take such powers away. The only excuse America has for entering any such combination is to rescue Europe from a possible condition of utter chaos. To do this through the machinery of the International Labor Conference will mean that, despite an overwhelming voting strength against them, the representatives of our Government and the representatives of our employers and of our labor, totalling four in number, must at all times lead and direct the other delegates in the American way or else be led and directed by the European delegates in the European way. Hence it is not strange if some Americans think that we can do more for Europe by acting independently in such matters and by demonstrating, through our success, the worth and soundness of our remedies.

WATCHER

What Is Happening Around Riga?

THE recent breaking into print of German military activities in the Baltic region of Russia has had for its reason the spectacular events in the neighborhood of the city of Riga. But these activities have their roots much further back in point of time. General von der Goltz and his nominally Russian ally, Colonel Bermond, did not suddenly appear on the scene of their present exploits. They had been preparing for what they now attempt to do for months past. The preparations are so interwoven with all kinds of intrigue that the whole story of what has been happening in the Baltic provinces since the armistice is a mass of tangled facts and rumors, in which it is very difficult to find the truth. A great deal of information, however, from trustworthy sources has reached this country recently, and the details, when pieced together, are extremely interesting.

The scene of the preparations and of the present operations of von der Goltz and Bermond is the territory which before the revolution constituted the two Russian provinces of Livonia and Courland and what is now sometimes called the Republic of Latvia. The German troops operating there are not altogether newcomers, and von der Goltz himself has been there for a considerable period of time. The story of his activities is told somewhat as follows by a Russian journalist now in Riga.

While the war was still on, large portions of this territory were occupied by the German troops. The end of the war found a German army corps in Courland. This corps was commanded by General von Katten, with von der Goltz as one of his officers. The break-up of the German armies in the west affected the eastern corps somewhat later, but toward the end of November its morale also began to give way, and the corps was apparently going to pieces. General von Katten relinquished in despair his attempts to hold the troops together. He went back to Germany and left von der Goltz in command of the corps.

In the meantime, the Letts organized a Government and declared the independence of Latvia. The seat of the Government was Riga. Headed by Ulmanis, the man who is the Prime Minister of Latvia to-day, this Government was decidedly anti-Bolshevik. One of its first purposes was to organize a sufficiently powerful army to withstand the military movements of the Lettish Bolsheviks, who were supported by Moscow. Soon after the formation of the Ulmanis Government a Red army, numbering nearly sixty thousand men, besieged Riga and was successfully advancing on the new capital of Latvia. Ulmanis appealed to the Allies for assistance, but instead of assistance received merely their permission to negotiate with von der Goltz and the Germans for aid.

The negotiations were very bitter and protracted. The Germans were represented by von der Goltz and a special commissary, Winnig, who had been previously sent from Berlin to spread propaganda among the German troops in the east. Winnig explained to the Letts that he thought it would be possible to get enough troops together to effect the liberation of Latvia, provided they were guaranteed the right of colonization in that country. In other words, the Germans wanted the Letts to give grants of land as compensation for services. Ulmanis was forced to agree to this proposal, but demanded, in return, the recognition of Latvian independence; to this Winnig agreed.

But while the negotiations were in progress, on January 3 the Bolsheviks captured Riga, and the Ulmanis Government was forced to flee to Libau.

In the meantime, von der Goltz had no thought of leaving the Baltic provinces. On the contrary, he had apparently conceived the idea of creating a German national centre on the eastern shore of the Baltic. There were two sources from which he could draw strength for such an organization. The first, naturally, was Germany herself, and the second was the German aristocracy of the Baltic provinces of Russia. Von der Goltz concentrated his efforts on the first, and there are indications that he there received very considerable support and that the German Government itself did nothing to discourage the idea. His professional agitators and recruiting officers worked hard in various parts of Germany, particularly in East Prussia; the equipment and the money necessary for the troops also came from Germany. Mitau became the centre of von der Goltz's activity, to which all sorts of Germans were attracted. Those who were dissatisfied with the new régime, who dreamed of the reestablishment of the old system, and all manner of adventurers flocked to him. And out of this material he succeeded in creating a powerful, disciplined, and well-equipped army.

While primarily occupied with the formation of his military organization, von der Goltz also lent his support, both moral and material, to the work that was being carried on by the German aristocracy of the Baltic provinces. The form which this local work took was the organization of the so-called "Landeswehr," which played a very important part in the events that have occurred recently. This Landeswehr is a completely equipped military unit of approximately seven thousand men, every member of which, from the lowest to the highest, is a German aristocrat from the Baltic provinces. The beginnings of the organization date back to the period following the armistice, although the work was not really completed until von der Goltz lent his assistance.

Between the Landeswehr and the Letts exists a deep-seated hatred, the former being oppressive, aristocratic landowners; the latter, including the Lettish Government headed by Ulmanis, being simple peasants. Von der Goltz was German enough and a poor enough politician to support these Germans against their Lettish adversaries. In April a successful conspiracy was engineered by the Landeswehr, by which the Ulmanis Government was overthrown and a new Government established, headed by a pro-German Lettish pastor, Needra. Ulmanis escaped aboard a ship in the harbor of Libau under the protection of the Allies, who refused to recognize Needra and decided to take up more seriously the question of the German intrigues in Latvia. The Needra Government lasted but a short time, because von der Goltz, frightened by the attitude of the Allies, withdrew his support and asserted that he had nothing to do with the coup d'état. As a demonstration of his good faith he offered to clear Riga of the Bolsheviks. The correspondence concerning his part in the overthrow of the Ulmanis Government went on for almost two months. The whole incident finally ended in his really moving his "Iron Division" against Riga, capturing the city from the Bolsheviks, and relinquishing it to the reinstalled Ulmanis Government. Then his troops again returned to their post at Mitau and remained there awaiting further developments.

While all this was going on, a new figure appeared on the scene. For some time prior to this, Prince Lieven, who had been an officer under the Czar, was quietly recruiting an anti-Bolshevik army in Germany. Ostensibly, Prince Lieven's troops were recruited from among the Russian prisoners of war. In reality, however, it appears that most of the troops were German soldiers dressed in Russian uniforms. There is every indication that the recruiting in Germany was done with the complete assent of the German Government. It was done very openly, the chief recruiting offices being situated at Danzig and Königsberg.

Prince Lieven's forces were organized partly in Latvia and partly in Lithuania. Ostensibly the object of his movement was to struggle against the Bolsheviks, but what was really behind it, is impossible to tell. Prince Lieven was in communication with the representatives of General Yudenitch, as well as with those of Admiral Kolchak, but at the same time he was in close contact with both von der Goltz and the Landeswehr, acting apparently in full accord with them. A Lettish newspaper, the Lieutuva, gives the details of a conference between his emissaries and the German representatives. This conference, says the newspaper, was devoted to the consideration of the necessity of complete coöperation between the German and the Russian forces in the struggle against the "common enemy." A complete agreement was reached on this question and a banquet was held in honor of the occasion, at which toasts were drunk in honor of the future Governments of Germany and Russia, which were declared to be henceforth friendly and allied nations.

It is apparent from this and other similar reports that the game played by the Germans in the Baltic provinces is concerned with the insuring in the near future of a German grip on Russia; nor is Prince Lieven's rôle obscure. On August 20, the Supreme Allied Council of Paris ordered his army disbanded. Lieven himself, with a part of his forces, has apparently obeyed this order, for, according to the latest information, his troops marched north to join General Yudenitch and to place themselves at his disposal. The majority of his troops, however, ignored the order and remained in Latvia. They constitute the army corps nominally commanded by Count Keller, one of Lieven's closest associates and a former large landowner in the Baltic provinces. The actual command is in the hands of Colonel Avalov-Bermond. Incidentally, it appears that "Bermond" is an assumed name. His real name is Prince Urussov, and he is a former colonel of the Russian Imperial Guards.

The negotiations between Yudenitch and Avalov-Bermond, having in view the latter's submitting to the authority of the Northwestern Government, came to nought, and Avalov-Bermond't continued to operate independently in the territory of Latvia. Towards the end of September, difficulties with him were foreseen by the Lettish Government, and in a conversation with a press correspondent the Lettish Minister of Foreign Affairs, Meyerovitz, spoke of Avalov-Bermond't's army as an independent military organization, operating on Lettish territory without permission. He said then that unless Avalov-Bermond't were willing to proceed northward and join Yudenitch, whose troops were operating in the territory of Esthonia, the Lettish Government would be compelled to take strong measures. As it appears from the events of the last few weeks, the aforesaid suspicions were justified, for Avalov-Bermond't, supported by von der Goltz and his troops, is now fighting against the Letts. And there is no doubt that he is fighting on his own initiative, since Yudenitch has recently outlawed him and declared him a traitor.

A very interesting question in connection with Avalov-Bermond't's activities is that concerned with the financing of his troops. His army numbers approximately forty thousand men, which means that very considerable sums are needed for its upkeep and maintenance. The information received from the Baltic speaks of all sorts of rumors current there on this topic. The most persistent rumor is that Avalov-Bermond't gets his money from a recently organized corporation with offices in Berlin on Unter den Linden. This corporation is backed by the financial giants of Germany, by the Krupps, Stienes, Siemens & Schuckert, the Allgemeine Electricitäts-Gesellschaft, and other financial interests. What obligations Lieven and his lieutenants have assumed in return for this financial assistance it is impossible to tell, though some obligations would seem to be implied.

Thus, it transpires that the German-led and German-directed forces now struggling against the Letts consist of three elements: First, the Germans themselves, represented openly by von der Goltz and his staff; second, the nominally Russian, but actually German, military unit of Prince Lieven and Colonel Bermond't, and third, the military organization of the German aristocracy in the Baltic provinces, represented by the Landeswehr. It is quite possible to admit that the immediate object of this whole movement is merely the overthrow of the anti-German Government in Latvia and the substitution for it of a pro-German Government. But there seems no doubt that the ultimate aims of the movement are much larger, the most important being the establishment in the Baltic states of a powerful link between Russia and Germany, which would make it possible, after political order has been reestablished in Russia, for Germany to continue to occupy in Russia just as commanding a position as before the war. It is difficult to suppose that von der Goltz himself is committed to any such programme. Else the German Government would not be supporting him and his troops. On the other hand, there is no doubt that many of his associates have something like a programme of restoration in mind. But there is no reason for any apprehension in so far as they are concerned, unless they actually come to control von der Goltz's organization.

From the point of view of Russia's democratic development, the events in Latvia have a significance similar to that which they have for the Letts, though not so immediate. For the Letts the issue is quite clear. An official of the Lettish Government expressed it as follows to

When I meet a member of the Landeswehr, my hand involuntarily seeks a revolver. How I long to send a half-dozen bullets into that haughty face! If you only knew what they did to us, how pitilessly they were murdering our troops during the Needra coup d'état, how they tortured our officials, how they maltreated the peasants! England and France demand from us that we preserve internal peace. And we must obey. But that is no solution of the problem. The barons have become so used to authority that they will not give it up. They still dream of the old system and of a restoration. But there is only one solution: Either we or they!

The events of Latvia have now put this "only solution" to the test of arms. And on the unfortunate soil of the Baltic provinces, that have seen so much of the war during past years, all these strangely mixed struggles are being waged, each move demanding blood and human life and new desolation.

A Lawyer's View of the Courts Martial

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

I assume that the reading public has had its fill of "Courts Martial." I had resolved not to rush either to the attack or to the defence, in view of the quantity of expressed opinions. But George W. Martin's article in the Review of October 11 drives me to break my resolution. I should dislike to have the last word sponsored by the Review—I hope we are nearing the end of the controversy—so obviously illogical and misleading.

At the outset, Mr. Martin admits that "certain members" of the Judge Advocate General's Department, for whom he apparently has some little measure of contempt, as being "largely lawyers taken from civilian life," have "adduced some cases of obvious miscarriage of justice." The admission occurs too early in his essay for him to have realized, apparently, its utter inconsistency with his main thesis, i. e., that he "never saw a man get an unfair trial nor one convicted when he was innocent." It is precisely because of those cases of "obvious miscarriages of justice" which have been "adduced"—I care not by whom—that no amount of sophistry can justify or excuse the system which made them possible. I have seen a man—an officer—convicted when I believed that he was as innocent as I was of the crime with which he was charged. When I, as Judge Advocate of the General Court before whom he was being tried, stated to the court, at the close of all the evidence, that I could not conscientiously ask for his conviction, I was reprimanded by my superior and told that I was "not to argue with the court when it wanted to pursue a certain course." But I had argued my fool head off in hundreds of cases for conviction, and had been commended by that same superior authority for my record of number of convictions. You couldn't keep that court from "soaking" the defendant. They convicted the officer just referred to. Why? Because if they acquitted anyone or didn't punish as severely as the Commanding General thought they should, the case came back "for revision" under that diabolical device of "revision proceedings," and in not one case that came under my observation did the court fail to do exactly what the endorsement in revision proceedings dictated should be done. Why? Because the detail to that particular court was the most popular assignment in the A. E. F. after the armistice, and the members of the court lost their jobs if they were not intellectually and temperamentally in tune with the Commanding Officer's conception of military discipline. Indeed, the court was "packed" with the proper "temperaments" to begin with.

Mr. Martin strikes most casually and entirely naively at the very fundamentals of our whole system of jurisprudence, when he would do away with "the professional lawyer's reverential regard for the formalities of the rules of law." He seems to glory in the fact that he has often "seen men convicted when the conclusion of the court was absolutely impossible, without disregarding the rules of evidence." His instance of the "irate old Colonel" tempted to commit murder when a mere lieutenant ventured to suggest that a conviction was, as a matter of law, unsupported by the evidence, apparently appeals to Mr. Martin as something to be pleased and amused about. The whole system of the law of evidence means nothing in Mr. Martin's young life, and the mere fact that a verdict is not supported by the evidence is a joke. He finds that the military court is so interested in the substance that it disregards mere formalities. And then comes Mr. Martin's justification of heavy sentences on the ground that the court has had the opportunity to observe the demeanor and attitude of the defendant and of the witnesses. Heavens above! Isn't that precisely the principle of good old Anglo-Saxon law that cries out against the "revision proceedings" referred to above? And, moreover, shall we find a man guilty of the crime of murder or of sleeping on post and send him to jail for the rest of his life ostensibly for that commission, when in reality the reason the court didn't like him was because his star witness seemed a trifle overbearing on the stand?

AN EX-MAJOR

"The Astor Fortune and Single Tax"

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Your comment on "The Astor Fortune and Single Tax" shows less than your usual appreciation of the actual point of view of those whom you criticize. Kindly permit me to touch on two or three out of the many phases of the issue suggested by your article.

In passing, it may be noted that your whole attempt to minimize the effect of land monopoly rests on the assumption that no fortunes are involved save those obtained solely by buying land at a low price and selling it at a high one. The tentacles of the octopus reach much farther than that. The artificial scarcity of land, and hence of access to raw materials, occasioned by the holding of land out of use, lies at the root of a multitude of special privileges, and destroys the normal competition which would check the rapacity of the large combinations of capital, and keep their profits at a just level. The indirect evils of land speculation are greater than the direct ones.

It is a gross fallacy to hold that the aim of the Single Taxers is to mulct the successful investor, merely because of a feeling that he is making too much money. If this were true, your idea that the unsuccessful investor should be compensated would have some merit. But the whole purpose of our movement is different from your conception of it. The abolition of race-track gambling was not undertaken for the purpose of squeezing the successful gamblers. It is our contention that speculation in land values, like gambling of other kinds and to an infinitely greater degree, is against public policy, whether the majority of the individual gamblers win or lose. The purpose of social grants and guarantees of titles to the private ownership of land is to stimulate its productive use, which does not mean merely its agricultural or manufacturing use, but includes home-building and all other useful application of labor to land. Land value is an increment caused entirely by social activity, and falls on idle as well as on productive land. It is, therefore, not confiscation in any sense, but simply payment for service directly rendered, when society uses the method of taxation to reclaim the fruits of its own activity from the beneficiary. On the other hand, taxation of improvements or other products of labor is clear confiscation of the fruits of the toil of the individual himself, and penalizes the industrious for the benefit of the idle and shiftless. It is this gross abnormality in taxation which the Single Taxers seek to cure. When a man pays for the social service he receives, he may do what he pleases with his land. However, it is obvious that, while the present system favors the idler and the speculator, the Single Tax would favor the industrious, since he who used his land to the best advantage would have more left after paying his tax; while today he who makes best use of his land is penalized for his industry and efficiency by being forced to pay higher taxes.

JAMES F. MORTON, JR.

New York, October 25

[We are glad that our correspondent recognizes that the Review is habitually fair to those whom it criticizes; but we have to point out that the article in question was no exception to this rule. It did not undertake to discuss the single-tax theory at all, but merely to point out the falsity of one impression that is widely prevalent, and that has been spread by many single-tax advocates, notably by the late Joseph Fels. "The case of the single-tax has rested in the general mind," we said, "less upon the inherent merits of the abstract argument than upon the effect on the imagination of a few dramatic examples." If Mr. Morton understood us to intend by this to imply that the single-tax argument has no inherent merit, we gladly assure him that that was not what we intended to convey. Henry George's "Progress and Poverty," in spite of errors which we regard as fundamental, is, in our judgment, one of the most powerful pieces of controversial writing of the past century.

The Single-Tax Doctrine

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

As a lifelong Single Taxer I wish to commend the Review for devoting the best part of a page to a discussion of the Single Tax movement, even though that discussion from the point of view of Single Tax partisans like myself must appear inadequate and incomplete.

The Review contends that most multi-millionaires do not accumulate their vast fortunes by means of speculative investments in undeveloped land; that the ordinary shrewd business man avoids an investment in real estate; that land speculation in hundreds of instances results not in profit but in loss. Such objections may answer the extravagant claims of individual "Single Tax orators." They do not come within a thousand miles of disposing of the proposition.

Let it be stated once for all that Single Taxers denounce and condemn land-value monopoly as such. Land-grabbing and land-gambling is a wicked outrage when practiced by a Prussian Junker or an Irish Marquis. It is equally vicious when practiced by the poor but saintly widow and those spotlessly innocent orphans. Single Tax does not propose to tax the rich man's land and exempt the poor man's land. Single Tax proposes to tax everybody's land, according to its value; that is, according to its monopoly-value. Single Tax does not propose to appropriate the gains of land monopoly while burdening the private individual with the losses. Single Tax claims for the public treasury all pure land-values, gains, losses, and everything else.

But the Review and its readers must be careful to reject an unduly narrow definition of "land." "Land" is a stenographic term for "gift of nature or advantage of location." The advantage of location is more readily and easily taxable; the gift of nature is far more apt to produce a colossal multi-millionaire. Water-power, then, is land; a mineral spring is land; a coal or copper mine is land; above all and most emphatically of all, a railroad franchise is land. In fact, an exclusive utility franchise is the very quintessence of land, and Single Taxers fairly yearn to socialize it.

The United States in World Trade

AMERICAN FOREIGN TRADE. By Charles M. Pepper. New York: The Century Co.

RICHARD COBDEN, in one of his earlier pamphlets, said, "It must be the part of a wise community to alter the maxims by which its foreign relations have in times past been regulated, in conformity with the changes that have taken place over the entire globe." He made this statement with particular reference to intervention in the quarrels of other nations, but Cobden seldom said anything that did not in some measure (usually in very large measure) connote trade. The remark is peculiarly applicable to this country after a lapse of fifty-three years. It is impossible for us to segregate ourselves any longer; for good or ill we shall be obliged to take pot luck with the rest of the world, and be governed in our activities quite as much by their changing conditions as by our own.

This necessity has not been thrust upon us by the war, though it has been greatly increased by it. One after another of our industries had reached the point of saturation. Foreign markets had to be found in order that the capital might be kept fully employed. Our protective tariffs had done their work too well; that is, they had over-stimulated domestic competition. Then came the extraordinary demand occasioned by the war, necessitating a tremendous enlargement of our industrial plant. The huge orders of the war period have doubtless enabled some of this new capital to be written off, yet enough remains to be taken care of out of future earnings to constitute a serious situation.

These changes have taken place at home, but we shall miss their point if we fail to consider them in connection with equally important changes that have occurred in recent years over the entire globe. The latter are too numerous to be set down at length, but certain of their consequences should be indicated. Practically every nation, great or small, except our own, is short of working capital and is under the necessity of enlarging its foreign markets to the farthest limit. This signifies that while we have emerged from the war as the world's great reservoir of credit, we have also emerged with the means, if we care to exercise them, of dominating world trade.

It is inconceivable that we should enlarge our credits to other nations materially without at the same time speeding up our exports; but if this were possible, we should still be forced, to an unwonted extent, to familiarize ourselves with the industrial conditions of the entire globe; for our granting of credits must be based on our knowledge of the conditions to which they are to be applied. But necessity will force us far beyond that point because the credits will, for the most part, go out in the form of goods and services, and, furthermore, we shall want to do more than lend other lands money and material for the purpose of putting themselves in position to compete with us in the world's market; we shall want ourselves to sell in that market in sufficient amount to keep our greatly enlarged industrial plant running at full capacity.

A vade mecum of foreign trade would therefore be an invaluable acquisition. If Mr. Pepper has not supplied us with one, it is because the task calls for more prolonged and minute investigation than even he has succeeded in making, which is stating the case in the strongest terms. The work before us is informing and stimulating from cover to cover, and the author approaches his subject fully conscious of the gravity of the situation that confronts us. The war, he says, proved to be a tragedy, precluding economic events whose significance is dimly apprehended. Foreign trade for the first time in their history has come to have a definite meaning to the American people. Information concerning the resources, the industries, and the trade of the several sections of the world, the economic tendencies and fiscal policies of the nations, is the basis necessary for an intelligent survey of the entire field of foreign commerce. This information he has sought to give, and he has wisely chosen to do so in the language of ordinary conversation rather than in that of the statistician or the market reporter.

The nature of foreign trade is not changed by the Great War, but the currents governing this trade are already greatly changed, and are likely to be infinitely more so as time lapses, as a result of political realignments, groupings of peoples under changed boundaries, the birth of new nations, creditor countries becoming debtor countries, and debtor countries becoming creditors. The imports of all the countries of the world taken together are the only measure of the total commerce. They are at best defective, yet they approximate a real standard, for they show the value in money totals of goods that have crossed boundary lines, and thus have become foreign trade. The common error, and Mr. Pepper confers a positive service in stressing this fact, is to add imports and exports. This practice ignores the fact that the exports of one country are the imports of another country, thus counting each transaction twice.

Imports and exports are, in other words, in the same relation to each other as supply and demand; that is, the one is measured in the terms of the other. If we import we must export commensurately, in the form of goods or services or money, unless we are living on our principal and are consequently on the road to bankruptcy. Thus, a survey of our foreign trade implies an inventory of the things we have that we can send abroad, the means and methods we employ in producing them and getting them into the hands of foreign customers, and the resources, the efficiency, and the national policies of the peoples with whom we would trade. These, in brief, are the subjects discussed in the work before us.

American agriculture, for example, was awakened and vivified by the demands of the war, but it will require time to find its place in the new adjustments of international trade relations. The first consideration is that the situation should be met by an intelligent organized class of producers who understand the economic basis of the industry in which they are engaged. The farmer as a business man is no longer a myth. The new agriculture, in the attention it gives to the processes of production and distribution, fixes the position of farm products in export commerce. The city farmer, who sits at the editorial table of the newspapers and institutes back-to-the-land movements, and who tells the farmers on the farm the need of raising more wheat or milch cows or beef cattle, or of rotating his crops more systematically, is not the person best fitted to advise what should be done. The farmer will do all these things when he sees a profit in them, and when he is able to find the labor required, since his business, while subject to more uncertainties than commercial business, nevertheless is based on growing crops and raising live stock for profit. There is profit for him in foreign trade, but he must be convinced that this is so before he will concern himself as to the best methods of bringing it about that a definite proportion of his products in one form or another finds its way abroad.

There is a plea here for nationalized efficiency. England's nationalized industrial organization is, we are told, the world's trade factor of to-morrow; Germany's monarchically socialized system of production and distribution is the experience of yesterday; America's individualized efficiency is the realization of yesterday and the prospect of to-morrow; France's industrial reorganization is the hope of the future. That the war did much to promote national efficiency is incontestable, though the real effectiveness of much that was undertaken has not as yet been altogether demonstrated.

The raw materials on which all foreign commerce is based are recapitulated by Mr. Pepper in a manner not to weary the reader, in a chapter which gives what may be called a bird's-eye view of their distribution over the face of the earth. Quite as interesting and important is a chapter on the diplomacy of commerce. Few persons realize the part played by treaties and tacit understandings in the development of foreign trade. The celebrated treaty which Lord Methuen negotiated with Portugal in 1703 was the model of such conventions during the epoch when commercial enterprise began to venture abroad, and when it was expected that benefits would be secured at the expense of non-participating countries. Adam Smith contended that the real purpose of the Methuen Treaty was to transfer a balance in gold and silver, of which Portugal had a surplus through her monopoly of the Brazilian trade, to England by enabling England to sell more woolens to Portugal than the amount of the wines bought from that country, and that the results were not commensurate with the concession. "A direct foreign trade of consumption," he characteristically observed, "is always more advantageous than a round-about one." In modern days Friedrich List opposed this view, claiming that the Methuen Treaty was a masterpiece of British commercial policy, and that its effect was ruinous to Portuguese industry.

Whatever may be the truth of this matter, the fact remains that since Lord Methuen's day the world has adjusted itself to the notion that the diplomacy of commerce consists in something more than getting the best of a bargain with another country. It assumes that there is something to exchange on each side on the basis of a fair bargain. This remains true despite the Great War, with its diplomatic dislocations, its nebulous economic alliances, and its apparent revival of racial bitterness. At first thought, these startling changes might seem to dispense with the diplomacy of commerce. More careful thought of the vast problems yet to be resolved indicates that it will have a wider field than ever before. Its future functions are to be evolved out of political alliances, proclaimed or implied, and in accordance with new interpretations and new adaptations of the principle of favored-nation treatment in commercial intercourse. They are to be exercised in the knowledge of newly born nationalistic policies, of international pacifism seeking to adjust itself to international competition, and to equality in the world's markets under the restrictions of national economic policies. The adjustment of contending interests, the obtaining of mutual advantages, and the ascertainment of reciprocal equivalents become more important than in the past. The field is wider, but the complexities are greater.

This leads of necessity to the discussion of economic alliances and favored nations, beginning with the Paris pact of 1916. The character of this discussion may perhaps be gleaned from the following quotation:

If the shades of Adam Smith and his French compeers, Quesnay and Turgot, hovered over Paris in the summer of 1916, they must have meditated on the fallibility of human judgments, for it was they who laid down the positive principles which were expected to insure the happiness of the world by universal free trade. The shade of Quesnay, in particular, must have meditated deeply, for it was he who dreamed of a world-economic state, and, with his fellow physiocratists, traced the outlines of the universal republic of commerce, starting with the premise that the merchants of all countries were to be considered as constituting a single commercial republic. But they could not have conceived of the politico-military system that was evolved in the European state that became modern Germany.

Of the League of Nations it is said:

The economic boycott proposed in the League of Nations is neither the act of a people in refusing to buy goods from an obnoxious country, nor that of two governments fighting each other with trade weapons. Its background is a denial of food and raw materials to offending nations as much as a prohibitive refusal to buy their goods. It is essentially a war measure, and, as is usual with war measures, one in which neutrals would be made to suffer penalties for not becoming belligerents. It does not merit further discussion in a consideration of world commerce under peace conditions.

The British Empire and the United States are to-day, and seem destined to be to-morrow, the two great world Powers in international trade, and for this reason their respective trade policies are discussed at some length by Mr. Pepper. Then follows a chapter on the restoration of American shipping, in which he says that those who advocate our buying cargo space wherever we can get it cheapest "take no notice of the benefit of paying ocean freights to national instead of to foreign shipping lines and keeping the money in circulation at home." As our author seems to hold the professional economists in dubious esteem, we shall not enter an objection on the part of the classical school. Something might, however, be said on the ground of pure utility. The outside world is eager to create large credits in this country in order to help pay off existing indebtedness here and to secure the raw materials of their industry. If we allow them to do this in part by selling ocean cargo space to us, we shall injure no American industry of long standing, and shall not depart from a policy which we have pursued comfortably for half a century.

The larger part of Mr. Pepper's work, and the part which constitutes it an exceptionally valuable manual of foreign trade, is devoted to an inventory of the trade resources of the different nations of the earth. It is manifestly impossible to recapitulate this information. And this is true also of what is said about investments abroad and about the American business man. The importance of these subjects cannot be overestimated. The stability of our industrial structure is contingent in no small measure on our willingness to export capital, yet of the rules governing such a movement we are notably ignorant. On the other hand, the task of acquiring the technique of foreign markets is still before the American business man.

There must be coöperation of our business men among themselves and coördination with the Government. But we agree with Mr. Pepper that there must be recognition that the American business character finds its strongest expression in individual enterprise and initiative. Where other Governments are tending toward a larger measure of actual participation in the enterprises of their nationals, the United States should remain as the exemplar of individualism in international business. That is real democracy.

Humors of Front and Rear

OUR CASUALTY, and Other Stories. By G. A. Birmingham. New York: George H. Doran Company.

THE MUD LARKS. By Crosbie Garstin. New York: George H. Doran Company.

THESE two volumes of sketches deal with the humors of the war, at the front and in the rear. They contrast as the work of an applauded if not quite professional humorist following, with fair success, his familiar vein, and the more spontaneous testimony of a healthy young fighting man to the comic alleviations of a most dreadful business. "G. A. Birmingham" goes at his job of cheering us up in his usual leisurely way; and, to tell the truth, spreads himself pretty thin. It is pleasant to hear his voice, and comfortable to know what is coming next. His title-story laughs sympathetically at certain manoeuvres of a "home guard" organization, the Ballyhaine Veterans' Corps: "They talk like soldiers. They have the true military spirit. There is not a man in the company under fifty years of age, but if the Germans attempt a landing on the Ballyhaine beach, by submarine or otherwise, they will be sorry for themselves afterwards—those of them who remain alive." "Our casualty" is an unfortunate old gentleman who is faithful to his orders to lie out in the wet until rescued, is lost track of by the military, and is finally brought in for drunk by an unimaginative policeman. The absurdities of military red tape give point to several other sketches. The best of them is the yarn about the soldier reported dead by mistake, in hospital, and duly coffined in spite of his obvious liveliness: nobody can find any way of reversing the official orders for his disposition as a corpse. After burying him, the padre releases him from the unfilled grave; officially dead, he is free of the army.

The best part of the book is the second half, the seven or eight stories expounding the whimsies of Ireland on the eve of Civil War. "A Gun-Running Episode," "United Ireland," "Ireland For Ever," and "Civilized War" all bear cheerful witness to the difficulty of any foreigner's (especially Englishman's) comprehending the quirks and quiddities of the Irish mind and heart. Perhaps the author's own interpretation of it all is well enough summed up in the dialogue which moralizes the "Gun-Running Episode." Two consignments of rifles and ammunition to the National Volunteers and the Ulster Volunteers have got into the wrong hands by accident. Officers of both forces meet ceremoniously:

There was a long consultation, and in the end they settled that it might be risky to start moving the guns about again, and that each party had better stick to what it had got. . . . When they had that all settled they all saluted again, and the Governor said something about hoping to meet O'Connell at Philippi. I don't know what he meant by that, but O'Connell seemed tremendously pleased. Where do you suppose Philippi is? "Philippi," I said, "is where somebody—Julius Cæsar, I think, but it doesn't matter—What your father meant was that he hoped to have a chance of fighting it out with O'Connell some day. Not a duel, you know, but a proper battle. The Ulster volunteers against the other lot."

"We shall have to wipe out the police first," said Sam, "to prevent their interfering. I hope I shall be there then. I want to get my own back out of those fellows who collared me from behind the day of the last rag. But, I say, what about the soldiers—the regular soldiers, I mean? Which side will they be on?"

"That," I said, "is the one uncertain factor in the problem. Nobody knows."

"The best plan," said Sam, "would be to take them away altogether, and leave us to settle the matter ourselves. We'd do it all right, judging by the way old Dopping and O'Connell behaved to each other."

Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings, I should never have suspected Sam of profound political wisdom. But it is quite possible that his suggestion would meet the case better than any other.

There are twice as many tales and sketches in "The Mud Larks;" but they would average much less than half in length, and little or nothing less in substance. One might suggest their quality by saying that they do for the British subaltern's life at the front what the Bairnsfather sketches have done for the British Tommy's. The author is (or was) a lieutenant of King Edward's Horse. The book is inscribed to the memory of a brother, Captain of Hussars, who was killed near Archangel a year ago. This professional soldier has seen and suffered the war at closest quarters, and has kept a gay boyish heart through it all—or at least a mask of gaiety so plausible as to be "all to the good" for his beneficiaries. His apology, if you desire it, may be found in the final sketch:

I can readily believe that war as performed by messieurs, our ancestors, was quite good fun. You dressed up in feathers and hardware—like something between an Indian game-cock and a tank—and caroled about the country on a cart-horse, kissing your hand to the balconies and making very liberal expenses out of any fat (and unarmed) burgeses that happened along.

With the first frost you went into winter quarters, i. e., you turned into the most convenient castle and whiled away the dark months roasting chestnuts at a log fire, entertaining the ladies with quips, conundrums and selections on the harpsichord and vieing with the jester in the composition of limericks.

The profession of arms in those spacious days was both pleasant and profitable. Nowadays it is neither; it is a dreary mélange of mud, blood, boredom and blue-funk. (I speak for myself.)

Yet even it, miserable calamity that it is (or was), has produced its piquant situations, its high moments; and one manages to squeeze a sly smile out of it all, here and there, now and again. . . . I have heard the skirl of the Argyll and Sutherland bagpipes in the Borghese Gardens and seen a Highlander dance the sword-dance before applauding Rome. I have seen the love-locks of a matinée idol being trimmed with horse-clippers (weep, O ye flappers of Suburbia!) and a Royal Academician set to whitewash a pigsty. I have seen American aviators in spurs, Royal Marines a-horse, and a free-born Australian eating rabbit.

Not these, but similar matters are chronicled in the present pages: the jests, the confidences, the mischief and daring and comradeship and sheer steady pluck and endurance of a single "officers' mess" in the mud-zone of recent fame. There are pretty touches of sentiment here too—very little "heart interest" in the vulgar sense, but glimpses of the unspoken love of comrades and the longing of the exiled for his own place. We are not saying this is a big book; but it is remarkably good of its kind. Most of the many volumes of sketches of the war have produced an undernote of hysteria. In their occasional boisterousness, as in their predominant bloodiness, we feel strains of the dismay and perturbation of the civilian facing unknown and unthinkable horrors. This is a book of courageous acceptance, the fruit of a quiet spirit as well as a merry one—the day by day evidence of "an officer and a gentleman."

H. W. BOYNTON

A Naval Inventor

FROM MIDSHIPMAN TO REAR-ADMIRAL. By Rear-Admiral Bradley A. Fiske. New York. The Century Co.

FATE was kind to Rear-Admiral Fiske, U. S. Navy, when, but a lad of sixteen, he entered the Naval Academy and embarked on a long and highly creditable career. He is essentially an inventor, and this step in life opened up to him a field, the application of science to naval warfare, then but hardly touched. With each successive year this field has widened to greater and more pressing importance, and in its tilling he has borne an exceptionally large and influential share.

Doubtless ships will never again pass through so many radical changes as marked the period of his active service. It was his good fortune to learn the rudiments of his profession on board unarmored wooden sailing ships, even today an excellent training, and to witness the reluctance with which steam was gradually accepted by naval officers as the primary and not the auxiliary motive power in vessels of war. The use of electricity in any form was then unknown on board a ship, and her smooth-bore guns on wooden carriages were handled by brawny bluejackets hauling on side and train tackles. He lived to have under his command battleships built of steel, burning oil as fuel, driven by turbines, with electricity employed for every purpose requiring mechanical power, including even propulsion. Before his very eyes there unfolded a vast panorama depicting the steady replacement of guesswork and the rule of thumb by scientific processes and delicate instruments of extreme and growing precision. To this evolution he contributed in large measure, possibly more than any other one man. He must have been a thorn in the side of some of his early commanding officers, wedded to the old sailing sloop-of-war and condemning to perdition everything modern, especially the steam engine, that abomination in the sight of the Lord and Neptune; for Fiske was content to accept absolutely nothing as incapable of improvement. Many a man can see wherein some particular new device may be introduced or an old one bettered, but few have that imagination which enables them to look far into the future; to evaluate, as in his case, the development of navigation and naval warfare; and to provide in advance for the wants arising out of this development. This imagination Fiske possessed to a superabundant degree; indeed, he could keep its exercise in check only with the greatest difficulty. Some of his old-time skippers must have regarded him with as much affection as a too attentive mosquito or a persistently elusive fly elicits on a hot day!

His book is thus primarily the autobiography of an inventor and, as may be supposed, it is replete with accounts of an inventor's woes, his trials, tribulations, disappointments, and discouragements under the jeers and scorn of the unbelievers, and his joy and delight when came success and approbation. The reader must expect in this work frequent complaints of indifference or even mulish opposition to his projects, as well as expressions of unqualified disgust when what he knew to be good and praiseworthy was condemned as impracticable by his seniors, ignorant or prejudiced, for such is the history of all inventors.

The long list of patents and inventions which bear Fiske's name and are described at length in this handsome, well-printed and illustrated volume demonstrates an extraordinary catholicity of interest, from lead pencils and typewriters to machine guns, muskets, electric logs, wireless telegraphy, turret turning by steam and later by electricity, the application of refined optical instruments to range finding and gun sighting, range indicators, engine-room telegraphs, etc., etc. The last child of his brain, the torpedo-plane, may yet prove his most important contribution to naval warfare.

The credit for his labors is very great. Our navy—all navies in fact—owe much to him, as no one can deny, but his friends must regret that he should have indulged rather too freely in self-laudation, however justified, and feel that his reputation could safely rest on the quoted encomiums of others.

Now this inventor spent many years afloat, so that woven into the warp of his inventions are episodes of his experiences in foreign ports and distant lands, the telling of which bespeaks a ready and agreeable use of the pen. Some of these stories might profitably be omitted, but not that which recounts Dewey's deeds at Manila, where Fiske was present. The chapters dealing with his cruises as captain make extremely pleasant reading; they are excellent travelogues.

After a term of sea service as rear-admiral in command of a division of our battle fleet, he was called to Washington and made "aide for operations" by Secretary of the Navy George von L. Meyer, who shortly afterwards was succeeded by the present incumbent, Josephus Daniels. In his new position Fiske was virtually, but not nominally, Chief of Staff of the navy. His chapters XXXIV to XL, inclusive, record his persistent and conscientious efforts to induce Mr. Daniels to realize that our navy was unprepared for war through lack of a staff, such as others have, to make plans for mobilization, attack, and defence; for a reserve in officers, men, munitions, aircraft, etc.; and last but not least, that while war with Germany might not come, its possibility was too great to be ignored. Had his pleadings as to aeronautics received due attention, we should have entered into hostilities in 1917 with a strong force of planes and trained aviators, which might indeed have proved of immediate and decisive value. Whatever may have been his superior's motives, to all these representations of a competent and qualified expert adviser, Mr. Daniels turned a deaf ear and actually planned in 1915 to send a battle fleet to the Pacific. Naturally this clash of contending principles and his testimony on the true conditions before the House Committee on Naval Affairs resulted eventually in Fiske's resigning his post as chief military counsellor to the Secretary of the Navy, to the consternation of the service and to the detriment of the nation. It can be but a melancholy satisfaction to him that the stern pressure of war's demands forced the adoption of some of the measures urged by him and rejected by his chief for reasons which Fiske apparently believes were political rather than patriotic. In his own person, however, he has had to pay the penalty for telling truths unwelcome to the Administration. Although he left office under the cloud of official disapprobation, the whole service, except, of course, the time-servers whom Mr. Daniels had gathered round him, applauded Fiske's action and revered the splendid moral courage displayed in the crucial test of his character to which this controversy with his superior had subjected him.

Mr. Daniel's reply to Fiske's temperately worded suggestions of incompetency will be awaited impatiently by the public. That they can be ignored is hardly conceivable.

Although dealing mainly with purely technical matters, these seven chapters will, of necessity, be drawn upon for the history of events prior and subsequent to our entering the World War. They should be read by every one seeking a just view of the subject, while the whole book deserves careful study by all interested in the growth of our navy since Fiske became a midshipman in 1870. Nor will this study be without entertainment, for in his well-told life story the humorous and the grave alternate with pleasing irregularity.

For his achievements in invention Fiske has been honored by many scientific bodies, doubtless a consolation under disapprobation which, although official, is not shared by his brother officers. He should also feel that he will not soon be forgotten by the country he has served so well in that particular sphere wherein he stands without rival.

A FRIEND of literature when literature most needed a friend, Gustav Pollak came and went his quiet way among the thoughts and aspirations of great writers. An acquaintance with Goethe and Sainte-Beuve such as few men to-day possess had filled him with ideals which made him incapable of confusing the trivial with the lasting; he had a sure instinct for greatness. After coming to this country from Vienna as a very young man, he married into the Heilprin family, in whose atmosphere of genuine intellectual achievement his own talents found a rich opportunity. It was in this period of his youth that he formed an intellectual association which in many ways was the proudest of his life. E. L. Godkin had founded the Nation, and to the high standards of this journal Mr. Pollak turned with enthusiasm and conviction. He wrote for it even in those young years, and for half a century it was such a personal friend and counsellor as few can claim in the flesh. When in 1915 the Nation celebrated the semi-centennial of its founding, Mr. Pollak honored the occasion by publishing the memorial volume, "Fifty Years of American Idealism," in which he, who had, year in and year out, bent so lovingly over the files of this great weekly, admirably summarized its distinguished services to the nation from which it took its name. It was a source of profound satisfaction to him that he lived to see the Review safely started, for in the ideals which conceived it he seemed to find something of the high purpose that went into the making of that other weekly.

Only those who knew Mr. Pollak personally will quite appreciate how much he graced this country or what our democratic institutions may mean to an incoming European of his fine temper.

In the death of Calvin Thomas, for upwards of a quarter of a century professor of the Germanic languages and literatures at Columbia University, America loses one of her ablest and sanest scholars. Though far from an old man—he died at sixty-five—and in active service until the day before his death, he had been so long a leader that in the eyes of most of his colleagues and of all of his students he had become a figure that might not inappropriately be called venerable. A rare combination of sound scholarship and sound sense admirably fitted him to lead the academic life, where he could infallibly be counted on for work of the highest quality in teaching, in administration, and in literary production. He held no narrow view of his field; a lover of German literature, he was also a lover of Horace; a teacher of German, he was at home also in the literatures of Scandinavia; a power in his own university, he was a wisely directive force in the teaching of his subject throughout the country. When the war broke out his firmly based thought was unshaken. Having taught German as one of the approaches to literature, having taught it with a view to promoting as he could the cause of international understanding and not at all that of Kultur, he had nothing to retract. The stakes contended for in the war were perfectly clear to his mind from the beginning and his position added to his words an authority which availed much in clearing the minds of some of his sorely perplexed colleagues in the field of Germanic studies and in furnishing to the public mind a wholesome contrast to the discreditable behavior of still others. It is by virtue of such men, not only in their work but in the memory they leave behind them when their work is done, that universities are great.

William Wingate Sewall, a Maine guide, tells us in "Bill Sewall's Story of T. R." (Harper) how long ago a party of hunters brought to his house "a thin, pale youngster with bad eyes and a weak heart." A friend warns Sewall not to let the boy overdo. "If you should ask him if he was having a good time he would tell you he was having a very good time; and even if he was tired he would not tell you so. The first thing you knew he would be down, because he would go until he fell." Mr. Sewall's summary of Roosevelt, with whom he was afterwards associated in a cattle ranch on the Bad Lands of Dakota, is worded thus: "I do not think that in nineteen hundred years there has been any man who had so many good qualities and knew how to use them as well as he did."

Mr. Sewall's simple and manly record proves that, in the total absence of literary training, he can nevertheless see and shoot straight when the game is a fact, no less surely than when it is a deer or lynx. A rude force in the style concurs happily with the same qualities in the substance of his work:

One day as we were passing a very steep, high bank, we noticed a great boulder, which looked as if it might fall any minute. We had scarcely got by when it did fall in. The wave that it created gave our boat a great lift, but it did no damage. At another time we passed for a long distance between very high and steep banks. Up in the bank, perhaps seventy-five feet from the water, on one side was a coal vein, which was on fire, and flames were issuing from various veins on the other bank. . . . One could hardly imagine a more desolate region. The bare clay hills, cut up with numerous washouts, and the brown dry grass, made a scene of desolation such as we had never seen before.

"Crime and Criminals" (Holt), by Dr. Charles Mercier, is the work of a man who has already written much in England in an effort to clear up the psychology of crime and insanity which brings him to conclusions both interesting and instructive. "With the exception of logic, there is no subject on which so much nonsense has been written as this of criminality and the criminal." Dr. Mercier himself writes much, but it looks like sense. In his view a criminal is a man who yields to temptation, and thus involves himself in conduct so preponderantly "self-regarding" as to clash with society's conception of what is necessary for its own preservation. Each of us has his breaking point. "The strain differs in different people and in the same person is different for different temptations; but everyone has his breaking strain in one direction or other, and if in this direction he is tempted beyond his strength he will fall." The reader who is attracted to this sturdy and wholesome point of view will not be disappointed in the survey of the field which Dr. Mercier develops from it.

Horace in the "Dry" Light

WITH absolute Prohibition now upon us, it may not, we trust, appear too whimsical or far-fetched to consider what will be the attitude of the "dry" censorial mind towards certain aspects of literature under the new conditions. Nobody will deny—not even a member of the Burns Club—that there is a very deep relation between the literature and the social life of a people; in fact, the one is almost conditioned by the other. And what piece of wisdom has had more honor than that speech of brave old Fletcher of Saltoun: that "he knew a man who was wont to say he cared not who should make the laws were he permitted to write the songs of a people"? The songs, it will be allowed, have been very "wet" in the past, and they represent a fearful chorus of opposition to the present "dry" law.

Indeed, the old classic idea of a poet was, the greater the soak the better the poet. The bard's drinking was therefore regarded with public approval and admiration as inciting him to flights of genius. Very literally he moistened his laurels with wine, and appropriately Anacreon, the bibulous Greek bard—quite unsurpassed in his peculiar line—choked to death on a grape-stone. Horace, also very moist and a nonpareil of literary excellence, warns us that

Nulla placere diu nec vivere carmina possunt
Quæ scribuntur aquæ potioribus.

Which I may rudely paraphrase:

Take it from me, Mæcenas dear,
There's no good song sans wine or beer;
And all that comes from the poet dry,
It scarce shall please, and soon must die.

Well, such were the ancient poets; the farther we go back the better and the wetter we find them. How and with what precautions shall they be read and enjoyed in the "dry light" which the Prohibitionist has now made to shine in our midst? How shall they be "edited" or expurgated for the ingenuous youth of a future drink-less America? And above all, what will the dry pundits and precisians do with Horace, that favorite of Bacchus and the Muses whom once to know in the slightest is to hate all dulness and intolerance forever afterwards. I will wager that the number of Prohibitionists who could readily construe the Horatian line is very small. What hope is there for that "heir of all the ages," the child of Prohibition, who is never to see a saloon or smell a wine-cork, when he reads in the beautiful tongue of Rome that "God has made all things hard for the mere water-drinker," and that not otherwise than by the gift of the sacred vine are our heavy sorrows dispersed (Neque mordaces aliter diffugiunt sollicitudines).

When he has become learned as to the nice shades of discrimination betwixt Falernian and Massic, betwixt Cæcuban and Formian, as well as other Horatian brands and tipples, will he not be apt to imagine something stronger than the decoctions of the soda-fountain? How also, I may ask, is Literature to find her account with this cool-blooded young person? how is he to realize the classic atmosphere? Will there be no poetic madness, no vatic frenzy for him in that superb Ode of the Second Book where the poet riots over his friend Pompeius safe back from the wars (Non ego sanius bacchabor Edonis), and the resonant clash of the lines seems to convey to us audibly the battle-shock of the opposing legions, with the ringing clang of sword against shield? Was a great battle ever depicted more tersely and feelingly—with a juster economy of expression, the true stigma of the Latin genius?

Pompei, meorum prime sodalium!

Tecum Philippos et celerem fugam
Sensi, relicta non bene parmula,
Cum fracta virtus et minaces
Turpe solum tetigere mento.
Sed me per hostis Mercurius celer
Denso paventem sustulit aëre;
Te rursus in bellum resorbens
Unda fretis tulit aestuibus.

Which we may depoetize in our pedestrian fashion, as follows:

With you, my Pompey, chosen pal,
The rigor of Philippi's fight
I faced—but as the bravest fell,
Alack, I dropped my shield in flight!
Mercury smiled, the bard forgave,
And straightway sent a cloud to save;
While you the reflux tide of war
Caught in its eddies whirling far.

Therefore repose your war-worn frame
Under my modest vine and laurel, Nor spare the gifts the Gods provide
In amphora, jug or barrel.
Quick, boy, the ointment and the crowns,
The Massic that sad memory drowns.
Let's choose our Master of the revel,
And fling discretion to the devil.
The lost one found brings such delight
I will—I will be mad to-night!

Will not our scholastic "dry" youth be led to believe in the superior virtue of wine-bred visions when he has grasped something of the wonder of the Nineteenth Ode (Lib. Sec.), the opening lines of which are among the most deeply poetical that classic antiquity can offer, conveying the very thrill of paganism:

Bacchum in remotis carmina rupibus
Vidi docentem, credite posteri,
Nymphasque discentes et aures Capripedum Satyrorum acutas.
Euhoe! recenti mens trepidat metu
Plenoque Bacchi pectore turbidum Laetatur.

Hear now, ye that are to come,
When we that live must all be dumb:
I saw Bacchus! gentle, mild,
On the hills remote and wild,
Teaching his songs to nymph and faun,
Which they with foot and voice did scan.
I saw the god! and ah, my breast
Trembles with rapture unexpressed;
The while my mind, prey to a fear,
Shudders to think a god was near!

Of a truth this old yet so provokingly young Horace is an incorrigible wetster, the laughing father of many generations of learned toppers, the chief author of the damnable heresy that poetical genius stands in need of vinous inspiration. Unluckily, the pestilent fellow wrote so well (whether with the aid of Bacchus or the Evil One) that many a poet since has drunk himself to death in a too ardent compliance with the Hora-tian precept. Even during his lifetime the bad poets sotted, as he tells us, from a desire to ape him (O imitatores, servum pecus!) and would stink of the wine-jug at noon-day. Curiously enough, while Horace's Muse is often wildly lyrical, with a divine madness the world would give something to recapture, she is never tipsy. I reckon he had always his desipere in loco well in hand, and was himself what the Scotch would describe as a "canny chiel at the drink."
At any rate, we can be sure that, after the heats of inspiration were past, he was always cold sober when he revised his copy and "turned the stilus."

But this consideration may not avail him with the stern Prohibition censor who will survey with just horror that swarm of impudent Bacchanalian ditties

—those invitations to Tyndaris, Lydia, Chloe, Barine, Glycera and other shameless baggages, to dine and drink with him at his Sabine farm—couches, too, with such infernally seductive art that the charm of them remains as fresh to us at it was to Horace's contemporaries or to the ladies directly concerned themselves. Here is a very famous one which I freely paraphrase by way of furnishing some useful hints to the new censorship. Ode XI, Book Fourth, Est mihi nonum superantis annum.

Phyllis, I have a virgin cask,
'Tis nine years old and better,
And in the garden flowers galore
Your sunny locks to fetter.

Gaily my house with silver shines,
The wreathed altar waits the lamb,
The chimney pours its festal smoke,
And runs each pleased and busy "fam."*

But you will ask the potent cause
Of these fair rites: it is the Ides
Of April, month to Venus dear,
When our festivity betides.

A day to us more sacred far
Than our own birth-day: void of fears,
Since from this light, Mæcenas mine
Reckons his flowing count of years.

Cease then to wound your heart in strife
With love ill-matched and jealousy,
And come, last of my loves, to grace
This day of days for mine and me.

For after you—nay, hear me swear!
Phyllis, no other love shall be.
Learn the new songs—and perish Care
At sound of our sweet melody!

What a snare is such a song for the ingenuous "dry" youth (arida pubes) of the next American generation! I fear me that Master Flaccus will not recognize himself when he comes forth, pruned and denatured, from the hands of his moral redactors.

It is not the merit of Horace's poetry that we are trying to make a point of—that was tolerably well settled about fifteen hundred years before America was hatched from the egg of discovery. No, we are merely concerned to show, by means of a jocosa imago, however inadequately hit off, that classicism without Horace is impossible, while a "dry" classicism such as Prohibition seems to make imminent, is a contradiction in terms.

It seems tolerably clear from these samples extracted at random that Horace in the "original package" is loaded with offense to the Prohibition type of mind—which has now become the ruling power in These States. I have combed over the Odes pretty carefully in hope of finding something that might be offered by way of extenuation, but my search has yielded nothing worth while. The trail of the serpent or the smell of the wine-cask—whichever simile you prefer—is over them all.

I did get on a wrong scent after the Ode to the Bandusian Fountain, the first and only time in his poetical career that Horace seems to have given any consideration to mere water. My thought was that it might have a placatory effect upon the "dry" censor and win some remission for the offending bard. But as might have been expected of that perverse bibulist, he merely praises the fountain as being worthy, if you please, of a libation of pure wine and flowers (dulci digne mero non sine flori- bus) and ventures the remark that its prattling waters (loquaces lymphæ) will be good for the cattle to drink!

Neither there nor elsewhere does the poet spare a line or a word on the hypothetical advantages of water-drinking for humans. That was a heresy apparently unknown to the round and smooth little gentleman of Tibur (teres atque rotundus).

One can but wish good luck to the bravest and jauntiest poet of all the ages, the charmer of all men and all times with his unequaled blend of sanity and genius—really, the one writer of all the classics who makes himself personally known, beloved and familiar to us. Many a hard bout has he had on the dusty ways of fame since he set out with his little packet of songs nearly twenty centuries ago. But gallantly and safely for the most part has he made the journey, and his head of gold is still exalted to the stars. (Sublimi feriam sidera vertice.) It is well to bear in mind that, however much the odds may seem to favor the Prohibitionist at present, there are those of approved wisdom who maintain that Horace will possibly survive America.

Land Ownership in England

IN all sorts of ways the observer of the English scene to-day perceives the effect of the war, but nowhere more clearly than in the land. Never has there been anything like the transfer of landed property which is now to be seen.
In the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, when the enclosure of commons occurred, an immense acreage found its way into individual possession, the enjoyment of land in common by the villagers and small holders was transferred to the landlords. But that movement concerned a particular kind of land; it did not have the general character of the present transfer, which involves large and small estates, mansions and parks, home and tenant farms, even moderate-sized country houses. Three paramount causes are at work: high taxation, high wages, and high interest rates. The owners of many estates are unable to live at their country seats,

hundreds of properties are burdened with charges, either for annuities or for loans. These have to be met and the margin for expenditure in the hands of the present proprietors has disappeared. The high interest obtainable for investments is equally powerful: many middle class owners of moderate-sized properties find that by selling at the high prices to-day obtainable they have a larger and securer income. Thus from one end of England to the other thousands of acres are every week now changing hands.

Who are the buyers? Of farms, in many cases they are the occupying tenant farmers; of estates, generally, persons with capital to invest, and often with a desire for country life, and to some extent speculative syndicates. It may be asked why have not the causes which have produced a tendency to sell prevented buying? In the case of tenant farmers the desire to purchase results partly from the necessity, it may be called, of remaining in the same pursuit in the same place, partly from the fact that the profits of farming have of late been proportionally greater than the increased taxation. In the case of the general buyer two causes are pretty plain. Large profits have been made by many commercial persons during the war, and they see no better form of investment for income and for pleasure than the purchase of land. Except in one particular these transfers do not indicate any important social or economic change. That particular is the change by farmers from tenancy to ownership. One can but wait and see what economic result will follow; in many instances these farmers must have charged their properties with loans to enable them to buy the land, and it is doubtful if some of them may not be hampered in the future for want of capital. Politically, greater conservatism may follow.

In the case of other changes they show by the keen competition for properties offered for sale that in the pre-war period there have been numberless buyers desirous of owning land who have been unable to get the chance of obtaining it. The change of ownership in this respect does not indicate any fundamental social change. The great wealth of England, the ineradicable devotion to the country, to its agriculture, horticulture, and sport, will keep the country life of the kingdom, in the immediate future at any rate, pretty much the same under the new as under the old owners of property. Old families depart, new families take up the ancient tale, and the quiet healthy country life of the Englishman, with its useful local duties and its pleasant outdoor occupations, will still continue much as it did before the war and its changes.

"When We Dead Awaken"

THE story of "When We Dead Awaken" can be summarized in two sentences. A sculptor whom middle age, marriage, and money have debilitated meets the stricken woman who had been the model and the inspiration of his youth. They share passionate retrospects, dreams of self-renewal, and the brief and barren exaltation of a common death in the snow-whirls of a mountain-peak. A meaning is readily found. Ibsen is the sculptor; Irene—the woman—is the early poetic and passionate idealism, afterwards overlaid by "Doll's Houses" and "Rosmersholms"; and the meeting is the belated and partial reversion to beauty or romance by a reaction, of which "When We Dead Awaken" is at once the product and the picture. The change was rather break-up than break-down in Ibsen; it was less the man and the artist than the realist who was aging. The death-throes of an old Ibsen mixed with the birth-pangs of a new; but death and birth were alike incomplete, and the result was realism shot with poetry.

Now the English players, in the handling of this unusual material, have done a very bold, very interesting, and very pardonable, if not strictly legitimate, thing. They have expelled the realism at least from the Irene-Rubek parts, and have turned the play into a poetic vision. As vision its beauty is manifest. Landscapes rare and lucent and unearthly, landscapes that Tennyson might have coveted as the setting of his Grail legends, have been provided by the taste of Mr. Lovel. The great moments in the play are spectacular. The emergence of Irene and the Sister of Charity in Act I, white figure against black, was so handled as to fire the imagination while it froze the blood. (I may remark in passing that three whitenesses, the white sculpture, the white woman, the white mountain-peak, unify and solemnize this play.) More powerful still perhaps, because less insistent, is the close of the act when, in the lighted doorway, the half-seen figure, in black robes of ominous import, receives the woman on whose lips the word "died" is still passionately quivering.

What becomes, under this process, of the long analytic, rather matter-of-fact dialogues between Rubek and Irene? They are not removed, but they are melted; the contours, the incisions, vanish; nothing abides but a distilment of their quality. Miss Kenmore, more fitly cast as Irene than as Hedda, picturesque, even marmoreal, in aspect, became a living type of death, not death in its wormy or grinning phases, but arctic death, white, silent, and remote. She spoke indeed, but the voice was shrouded, and passion moved beneath its glaze of apathy like a brook beneath its crust of ice. Mr. Lovel was too passionless for the warmer moments of Rubek, and the seductive modulations of his cushioned voice hardly made up for the shortage of vitality. The fire had died down both in Irene and Rubek, but the difference between Miss Kenmore and Mr. Lovel in this respect was the difference between embers and ash-heap.

In his scenes with Maia, where passion was not wanted, Mr. Lovel showed not a little of that minute and changing exactness, that scroll-sawing, if I may so call it, which is the mark of Ibsen and the Ibsen actor. This conducts me naturally to the work of Miss Cicely Barsham and Mr. A. C. Henderson as Maia and Ulfheim. Both these persons acted with vigor and care, and seemed ready at times to wrest the leadership from the principals, with the stealthy collusion of Ibsen himself, who gave them the lion's share of the dramatic interest. They did not finally achieve this substitution, clever as both were, they could not cope with Ibsen. They were not to blame if Maia and Ulfheim eluded their grasp; Maia and Ulfheim belong to that class of difficult persons who are the more difficult because they appear to be simple. In Ibsen himself they are boldly and brokenly sketched, and Miss Barsham and Mr. Henderson, keen for points, but giving equal sharpness to diverse and adverse points, finally tore the sketches into bits.

Reference Books

EDITORS of newspapers and periodicals, librarians, and bookdealers receive many inquiries about reference books. Which are the best to own? Are there any good inexpensive ones? Or small ones? Are these reliable?

In general, if you own a good encyclopædia (the "New International" or the "Encyclopædia Britannica"), and a good dictionary (for the one-volume works either "Webster's New International" or "The New Standard Dictionary") you have therein a reference library, apt to answer all your questions, and excellent for the information it contains. But these are large, and not inexpensive. The "Everyman Encyclopædia" (Dutton) will take up little room (the volumes

Even the Fastidious,

I believe, appreciate an opportunity to save money on one of the necessities of life.

Some of my fastidious customers would no doubt continue to come to me three or four times a year, if I were on an expensive block on Fifth Avenue.

Nowadays, however, when the price of everything is rising, it is a satisfaction to me to be able to build business suits, overcoats and evening clothes of the highest possible grade, at a price that represents a real saving to my customers.

I am able to do this because my office is on the sixth floor of an office building, where the rent has not become impossibly high.

I have many out-of-town customers as well as New Yorkers.

may be carried in the pocket) and will cost you much less. It is not absolutely free from errors—though I have not discovered any very important ones—but it is an admirable and convenient work, nevertheless. And for desk use, good, smaller dictionaries may be found—the “Students’ Edition of a Standard Dictionary” (Funk & Wagnalls), for example.

Here are four extremely useful reference books, which may be acquired at trifling cost: “The World Almanac and Encyclopedia” (Press Pub. Co.), for the current year, with its extraordinary collection of information; the “Statistical Abstract of the United States” (Government Printing Office), an annual, with tables of figures upon a wide variety of subjects referring to this country; the “Official Congressional Directory” (Government Printing Office), with its information about the personnel of Congress, Government departments and commissions, Consular and diplomatic service; and—for New Yorkers—the “Municipal Year Book of the City of New York” (Municipal Reference Library).

Here are some, not so low in price, but invaluable in their fields. First, “The Statesman’s Year-Book” (Macmillan), a “statistical and historical annual of the states of the world,” with its brief but convenient information about all countries, and good references to further sources of knowledge. Next, “Who’s Who in America” (Marquis), an honest, constantly useful, and often highly diverting biographical dictionary of living persons. Its English forerunner is “Who’s Who” (Macmillan), similarly valuable and international in scope. Add to these, Whitaker’s “Almanack” (more especially British), “Chambers’s Biographical Dictionary” (Lippincott), for “the great of all times and nations,” dead as well as living, and the “Scientific American Reference Book” (Munn), for handy information about scientific matters, and you will have a shelf, or half a shelf, of books which ought to be convenient in connection with the news of the day.

THE Mine Workers' leaders have submitted to the law with a promptness all the more impressive because it was preceded by a declaration of support for the miners by the American Federation of Labor. The lesson that this teaches was so compactly put in the statement of the acting President of the union that comment can add nothing to it:

Gentlemen, we will comply with the mandate of the court. We do it under protest. We are Americans. We cannot fight our Government. That is all.

It only remains to put in motion those agencies for the rational adjudication of the dispute between the miners and the operators which should have been accepted from the start. To this task the Government applied itself immediately upon the retirement of the union leaders from their untenable and intolerable position. As we have heretofore stated, the miners have, in our judgment, a strong case in equity for the invalidation of the terms of the contract into which they entered for the duration of the war, whatever may be the technical merits of this question. The investigation and arbitration now presumably about to be entered upon should take a broad view of all the issues involved, and should result not only in assigning to the miners what is fairly due them, but in introducing a system which shall, so far as possible, obviate the glaring irregularities in their employment. It must not be forgotten, however, that to keep the miners steadily at work implies no necessity of keeping at work any specified number. A given amount of work subject to long interruptions can be spread over the whole year, not only by shortening hours indefinitely, but equally well by diminishing the number of men employed.

SENATOR HITCHCOCK must have felt a pang of keen regret for the grievous error of policy which the Administration forces have committed, when it was acutely brought home by a remark of Senator McCumber's. The Nebraska Senator was reproached by Senator Thomas for his failure to support the reservation which the latter offered as a substitute for the Lodge reservation on Article X, and which was the same as that proposed some weeks ago by Senator McCumber himself. At that time, said Mr. McCumber, he was hoping to effect a compromise between the two sides in the treaty fight; and the truth is that for months it ought to have been clear to everybody that the only path of safety for the Administration side was to assent to just such a compromise as Mr. McCumber and his associates had in mind. The Senator added:

But it was not accepted by the minority. They declined to consider it. In the interest of coming to an agreement I withdrew it, and intend now to support the committee reservation. The opportunity for compromise was rejected by the minority. The blame is upon them.

Fully as we agree, however, with the view that the blame for failure to come to an agreement rests upon the Administration side, and not upon the group of moderate reservationists who so long endeavored to bring about a reasonable compromise, it is also to be said that these men themselves failed to rise to the level of the great opportunity which was evidently before them. They were masters of the situation, provided only that they asserted their position with adequate firmness and resolution. Nobody could accuse them of being actuated by any motive other than the desire to do what in their judgment the good of their country and of the world dictated. It was irritating, and indeed grievously trying, for them to find that their endeavors did not meet with the response which they had the right to expect; but that was not a sufficient reason for their failing to exert a power which, by the moral strength no less than by the numerical basis of their position, would have been irresistible if it had but been unflinchingly asserted. They deserve credit for their motives, and for the conciliatory temper which they so long displayed; but in the face of difficulty and discouragement they failed to show the steadfastness which was essential to the accomplishment of their purpose.

THERE are those who profess to see in the arrests of revolutionary agitators, and the proposed deportation of aliens among them, an attack upon individual liberty, and persecution for the sake of political opinion. This could be true only if we are to admit that liberty and anarchy are synonymous, and that freedom of political opinion carries the right to put one's opinions into practice through the violent subversion of existing law and order. Not one of these men was arrested for holding or expressing the belief that the government of the United States might be, or ought to be, changed. The framers of our organic forms of government, from the national Constitution down to the charters of individual cities, have always recognized the possibility of finding something better, and have provided orderly methods for making changes. But they have wisely insisted that any element wishing a change shall convince either the people themselves, or their duly chosen representatives, that the change is desirable. The freedom of individuals or groups to kick the laws aside is anarchy, and intolerable even to anarchists themselves. No anarchist group exists in which dissentient opinion does not rise and is not suppressed. Majorities are of course sometimes unwise, and well-organized governments, including our own, put Constitutional checks upon their power, to be altered or removed only by methods requiring time for thought and discussion; but after all, human reason and experience have developed nothing better than a regulated majority government, with a definite and orderly method of changing the regulations when the common welfare so directs.

THE revolutionists arrested during the past week were for the most part aliens, having taken no steps to acquire the rights of citizenship in the country whose future form of government, or deprivation of government, they wish to dictate. They will be punished as criminals only if they shall be proved to have committed crimes defined as such under existing laws. They may be deported to the country from which they came, if their conduct has brought them within existing legal provisions for deportation. In the quarters where many of the arrests were made have been found large quantities of incendiary literature, inciting to treason, slaughter, and destruction of property. When in a storehouse and distributing centre of this crime-inciting material the police find a crowd consorting with its purveyors, it is hard to see how their sworn obligation could be fulfilled with anything less than holding the entire number for examination, even though it is probable that legally incriminating evidence will be found only against a few. But the right and duty to deport certain classes of aliens do not depend upon the commission and proof of criminal acts. This country, or any other, has the right to guard its own doors against the intrusion of those who come with the intent to defy its laws, disturb the peaceful current of its life with violence, or destroy its social and political institutions. Existing law makes ample provision for the deportation of such aliens. And the professed American who would deny that right, or put obstacles in the way of its lawful exercise, deserves not to be heeded, but to be watched. His trouble may be only aberration of judgment and lack of insight as to the natural result of his actions; but he is a force that makes for evil, none the less.

SOME of the Boston police strikers made a long jump at the conclusion that Governor Coolidge, reelected by a heavy majority just because he had stood unflinchingly in opposition to their "crime against civilization," would now be in so kindly a mood as to permit their return to the service, if only they would sever their connection with the Federation of Labor. To put it briefly, they want Governor Coolidge to say, "I have won the hearty approval of three-fourths of the people of Massachusetts by standing up for law and order. I shall now proceed to get the other fourth, and make it unanimous, by lying down to anarchy and disorder."

THE collapse of the German effort to bring healing to the world (Am deutschen Wesen soll die Welt genesen) does not mean that the case has been given up. Norman Angell has written a book to show that a "new social order" (a euphemism for patients who cannot stomach the bolus of Bolshevism under its own name) is the one medicine which will enable the digestive organs of the world to dispose successfully of the burden of its war debts. Others have recommended it as a sure cure for crime, and still others as an unailing analgesic for all forms of social unhappiness. It only remains for somebody to devise a method of applying the cure without danger of the result that we sometimes hear of in surgery—an absolutely perfect operation, but with the patient unfortunately dead on the operating table at its conclusion.

SENATOR LUSK made the statement, the other day, that the communist movement for the overthrow of the United States Government was not started in Russia but in Germany. "It is safe to say," he added, "that Germany will not be distressed by any Bolshevik moves here." The same issue of the Times which printed this declaration contained a despatch from Berlin quoting Gustav Noske, Minister of Defense, as having said that "a revolution in America would mean that millions of people in Germany would be threatened with death by starvation." If Senator Lusk's statement were correct, Noske's utterance could be accounted for only as a very cheap device for hoodwinking the American authorities. But the situation in Germany is sufficiently serious to justify belief in the sincerity of Noske's prediction. The Senator is doubtless right in saying that the movement started in Germany, but that was the Germany of the Hohenzollerns, which, shortly before its downfall, in a spasm of despair, launched into a policy of supporting Lenin and his Reds in Russia. But that "Germany will not be distressed by any Bolshevik moves here" is not true if it is intended to imply complicity of Bauer's and Noske's Government in the present communistic propaganda. It is only a very small minority in Germany that would hail revolution here as a German success: the radical wing of the minority Socialists and the Spartacan group, who see in Noske their arch enemy. For it was he who suppressed the Communist riots, and he can hardly be expected to favor elsewhere revolutions which would strengthen the revolutionary elements in his own country.

TO one with a memory reaching back of 1917, it is rather amusing to find Count Bernstorff telling the German committee on responsibility for the war just why he did not take any part in pro-German propaganda. Has his memory gone blank, or is it possible that he is clearing his conscience on the readily available technicality that propaganda which does not propagate is not propaganda at all?

PHILIP SCHEIDEMANN has made the anniversary of the German revolution an occasion to make a plea for a union between Minority and Majority Socialists. The followers of Haase, who remember with bitterness how the Majority leader robbed them of the fruits of the revolution which they claim to have been their work, will not easily be brought to consider his proposals with much favor, unless cool appreciation of political advantage outweighs with them the feelings of jealousy and hatred. And on the other hand, their dealings with the Spartacans, who insist that the world's salvation can only be brought about through the dictatorship of the proletariat, has made them suspect with the Majority comrades, so that a fusion seems difficult, if not impossible. Scheidemann's advocacy of a reconciliation may, none the less, have a definite result in sending the right wing of Haase's group over to the other party, which in that case would have to break with Noske and comrades of his conservative type. For between Noske and Haase there can be no peace. That Scheidemann has some such end in view is not unlikely, as he and Noske are declared antagonists. Shortly after his return from Switzerland Scheidemann opened a bitter campaign in the press against his former colleague, and his present propaganda for reunion may be an attempt to fight his opponent more effectively in a round-about way.

DR. DRYANDER, the ex-Kaiser's court preacher, still signs himself Hofprediger, says a correspondent in the London Spectator. We must admit that for a man whose business it was, on command "von allerhöchster Stelle," to invoke the blessing of "die höheren Mächte" on His Majesty's affairs, it must be difficult to think of the power thus superlatively referred to as dethroned.

THE Public Service Commissions, working in conjunction with the railroads, have brought it about that in nineteen States a uniform signal at grade crossings has been adopted. The exact form of the warning—a white disc with the letters "RR" in black—is adopted as the result of protracted experiment. But more important than the form is the fact, now approaching realization, that it will be uniform throughout the country. The automobile goes everywhere, and it is a poor afternoon's run that does not yield to the children in the back seat, who are avid in the observing of such things, the flashing glimpse of licenses from, say, Ohio, Louisiana, and California to add to their collection. But now the time is coming when every motorist, no matter how far afield a holiday spirit may take him, will be met at each grade crossing with a familiar sign, suggestive of home and its responsibilities. Thus the automobile, with all its faults, works mightily towards the consolidation of these United States.

FROM the recent deliberations of the Royal Society and the Royal Astronomical Society over Professor Einstein's theory according to which light travels in a curved and not in a straight line, it is possible for the man in the street, even if the scientific bearings of the theory are quite withheld from him, to draw a sort of moral. Parallel lines do meet, a circle is not really circular, the three angles of a triangle do not necessarily equal two right angles. Heavens above! Well, precisely—Heavens above; it has nothing at all to do with the earth beneath. In the strange seas of thought which one must forever voyage alone, sighting perhaps a bare dozen of friendly sail in the course of a lifetime, these things may sometimes be true. But the thought of most mortals, which perishes of suffocation in the thin, cold space that wedges the stars apart, will continue to breathe lustily the air of a world in which a circle, O Giotto, is round, and triangles and parallel lines, O Euclid, do most certainly behave as thou sayest. No carpenter in his folly will to-day square his timbers a whit otherwise than before.

Here, then, is the moral. There are two worlds—the world in which life is lived, a world of obstacles, of powers not ourselves making in all sorts of confused directions, a world of motion on which we are thrown and bidden gain a footing as we can, and another world in which thought moves untrammelled save by some rather rigid rules of its own setting up. These two worlds hold profitable commerce with each other. A few men, in various ages, starting in the world of everyday with some such trifle as an apple or a flower, carry it about with them in the transcendental world, and, behold! gradually all men, for the most part wholly ignorant of why it has come about, begin to think dynamically and not statically, functionally and not categorically. The philosophers, even in the darkest age, have always known that the earth is round; gradually all men come to believe it and order their thought accordingly. But what shall be said of the man who in the transcendental world, not of mathematics, but, let us say, of social organization, has met with a truth that flouts the world of "pleasing, anxious being," and who thereupon demands immediate acceptance of new-found perfection everywhere and by all men?—who would cast aside all social mathematics because somewhere, "pinnacled dim in the intense inane," parallel lines do meet and a circle is not really circular?—who would destroy the profitable commerce of two worlds by substituting, with a violence the kingdom of heaven itself would not suffer, the one world for the other? Ponder it well, O Man in the Street, for some such moral as this is about all you will ever get from the utterances of the German mathematician and his Royal British expounders.

"CONSIDER," said Professor MacAndrew Cantlie, with the cynical smugness of one who perpetrates an epitaph, "the sad fate of Donald MacTavish, now touring the country with his lectures on the labor problem—as though it were a sum in arithmetic and not a conflict of elemental forces, the outcome of which no man can either predict or avert. Yet MacTavish from a child was rooted and grounded in the faith of John Knox, and once believed that the ways of men, both the evil and the good, were foreordained from all eternity. A man of his gifts might have risen in the Kirk, but at college he gave himself to the study of David Hume and Adam Smith and the two Mills, and presently felt called to preach the gospel of Political Economy. Orthodox as ever, and with all the zeal of a new convert, he went so far as to defend a sort of economic transubstantiation—the comfortable doctrine that all the base elements of human nature work together for the glory of God and the good of man. With this simple faith he might have had a distinguished academic career, but that in the course of time he fell under the spell of Karl Marx, renounced the economists and all their works, and embraced with the enthusiasm of his Celtic temperament the profound nonsense of orthodox socialism. Calvinist at heart, he gloried in economic determinism, and when he thought on the social revolution he saw as in a vision the coming of the New Jerusalem. For some years he was a minor prophet of socialism, and did his part in the way of arousing the proletariat and terrifying the capitalists. Yet he could not close his mind to the heresy of revision; he began to see the mistakes of Marx; and gradually but surely he became convinced that not one of the dogmas of socialism was built upon a truly scientific foundation. It was as though the solid ground had crumbled beneath his feet, with the abyss of anarchism before him, the precipice of reaction behind, and no safe middle ground to right or left. Then the tempter came and bought Donald MacTavish as 'talent' for the Chautauqua circuit, and now he solves the labor problem every night as any common social reformer might do. But he is a dogmatist without a creed, a Samson shorn of his locks, a blind leader of the blind, an intellectual vagabond and derelict, and the epitaph which I have selected for his tomb is the ancient proverb: 'As a bird that wandereth from her nest, so is a man that wandereth from his place.'"

Voices in the Air

WITH the signal exception of Governor Coolidge's phenomenal victory, the results of last week's election are about as colorless as possible. But that very absence of color has in the present juncture an unmistakable significance. During a full twelvemonth, the American people have lived in a state of mental unrest such as no previous experience has even distantly approached; and that twelvemonth had been preceded by a year and a half of incubation of this unrest. Long before the armistice—indeed from the moment that our entry into the war gave the last touch of completeness to its character of world-wide cataclysm—the notion that the world was to be made over into something altogether different from what we had known had become one of the most familiar of public commonplaces. And upon the cessation of hostilities, the school of thinkers and writers that had most actively spread this notion displayed an activity, and attained a prominence, which, during the war, "the instant need of things" had made impossible. Add to this the discontent automatically generated by the hardships which millions have suffered from high prices, and it is plain that if an underlying desire for radical change possessed the people at large, there was every reason to expect that it would be manifested in some notable way in the election.

But one scans the horizon in vain for any sign of the kind. The people have been voting everywhere just about as they have always voted. In New York, where the old, old issue of Tammany happened to be accentuated by Murphy's insolence in the matter of a judgeship nomination, the voters rose to it with an eagerness quite incompatible with the state of mind of a people absorbed in the prospect of a new-made world. In Massachusetts, the response which was given to Governor Coolidge's appeal so far exceeded the expectations of his supporters as to place beyond all question the unshaken loyalty of the people to the established institutions of the country. In Nebraska, the movement headed by the Townleyite Non-Partisan League suffered disastrous defeat. And nowhere, so far as we have observed, has the balance of the old parties been disturbed in favor of either by the intrusion of an issue or of a candidacy that savored of Socialism. If some long-absent explorer had got his first touch of our situation from reading the election returns and the current comment upon them, he would have had no reason to suspect that anything new or unusual had been disturbing the public mind in the past two years.

To infer from this that no great disturbing forces are at work would be the height of folly. The positive evidence of such disturbance is too concrete and too massive to be disposed of by any conclusion that the figures of last week's election are capable of furnishing. Yet the lesson that they do teach is one of first-rate importance. The more it is true that things are in a state of flux—the more it is true that new forces, or forces formerly negligible, are now to be reckoned with as serious factors in our political and social life—the more is it necessary for us to keep our heads level, and not to regard as certainties what are in fact only possibilities. To admit the existence of strong tendencies is one thing; to assume that they are sure to prevail, still more that they are already in full possession of the field, is quite another. A people fit for self-government, a people equal to grappling with the problems of a great epoch, must preserve above all the sentiment that it is the duty of every man to bear a man's share in deciding what ought to be, not to conform to some fatalist notion of what will be or to some hypnotic suggestion of what is. There is a definite way—crude and imperfect, indeed, but substantial and intelligible—of ascertaining the voice of the people; "voices in the air" may be anything that the wish or the thought of him who professes to hear them may prompt him to imagine. If the commonplace character of the recent election should help to eject from our political thinking that element of vague prophetic emotion which has of late played so prominent a part, it will have been of inestimable service to the nation.

It is not only in relation to radical changes in the economic and social order that this dangerous leaning upon prophetic emotion has been manifested. To it must in no small measure be ascribed the melancholy history of the League of Nations controversy. The President chose to regard the issue as one upon which there was no room for honest difference of opinion. It was a struggle between Ormuzd and Ahriman, between the forces of light and the forces of darkness. Accordingly, opposition was to be overcome not by argument and persuasion, but by denunciation and exhortation. He had but to stir up the people, and opposition would crumble under the manifest decree of public sentiment. Yet nothing of the kind happened. Neither in the election returns nor in the conduct of Senators is it possible to read the slightest indication that the people have been stirred to wrath by the refusal of the Senate to accept the President's position. The multitude of impassioned speeches upon which he expended his powers, with such regrettable effect upon his own health, has had no appreciable influence either upon the Senate or upon the public mind. How different might the showing have been had he met the real difficulties of the situation, and concentrated his effort upon one or two masterly and comprehensive speeches fairly grappling with the great argument. The whole nation would have welcomed such an appeal to its intelligence; adversaries and doubters would have been put to the necessity of squarely meeting what he said; it would have been impossible for Lodge, or Knox, or anybody, to put the issue on that plane of maneuvering for points on which it has been so distressing to see it; and those Senators who, while not going all the way with the President, sought to come as near to his position as they could, would have been immeasurably strengthened in their purpose. Above all, the spirit of the situation—the temper in which the Covenant was accepted, if it is to be accepted—would have been infinitely better than there now seems to be any chance of its being.

We are living in a stormy time, and we must not only keep our eyes open but keep our judgment clear. It is blindness to deny that our institutions, political and economic, are being subjected to an unprecedented strain; but it is folly to jump to the conclusion that they are sure to break under the strain. The revolutionary has no more effective adjunct than the spread of the notion that his object is already all but achieved; for nobody relishes the thought of being regarded as but a lingering survival of an outworn age. But if we are not to become the victims of this delusion—a delusion which has the lamentable quality of tending to bring about its own fulfillment—we must firmly eschew the habit of thinking that great issues of any kind may rightly be settled by an appeal to "voices in the air," or to anything but the mind and conscience of the individual human beings whose duty it is to pass judgment upon them.

The Socialist Vote in New York City

"LOOKING the whole thing over," says the New York Times, "what reason have the Socialists in New York City for keeping up their fruitless agitation?" In 1917, says the Times, Mr. Hillquit got 145,322 votes, while last week the Socialist candidate for President of the Board of Aldermen got only 126,365 votes; whereas in view of the addition of the women's vote since 1917 he ought, if the party held its own, to have polled at least forty per cent. more than Hillquit did—in other words, more than 200,000. The New York Evening Post takes a very different view. "The Socialists," it says, "have reason to congratulate themselves on their showing yesterday. Only a year ago they polled 85,000 votes in the city out of a total of 922,000. Yesterday they scored nearly 125,000 votes out of a total only 5,000 larger. The Socialists have not reached the Hillquit vote of 1917, which was manifestly a mixed vote, but they can show an increase of 50 per cent. over last year, when they received 9 per cent. of the total vote, against 13 1-2 per cent. yesterday."

The truth, we take it, lies between these two extremes; and what it amounts to is that in the election last week the Socialists have shown, so far as can be judged, neither a loss nor a gain of strength. It is true that the Hillquit vote was swelled by elements which had no real connection with the Socialist movement. It was largely a pro-German and anti-war vote. On the other hand, it must always be remembered in considering the Socialist vote, or the vote of any "third party," that a great many persons find in such a party a mere medium for the expression of dissatisfaction, and refuse to indulge in that luxury when by so doing they throw away their vote as regards some office in the filling of which they are substantially interested. The 85,000 votes polled by the Socialists in 1918, to which the Evening Post refers, were cast for their candidate for Governor, in a contest in which there was intense public interest. On that same day their candidate for the colorless office of Secretary of State received not 85,000 votes out of 922,000, but 97,000 votes out of 870,000. To have advanced from that point to 125,000 out of 927,000 after a twelvemonth filled with all manner of hardship, confusion, and discontent, is certainly no striking evidence of growth, and offers no ground whatever for any prognostication of future developments.

if the recent election had been as discouraging as the Times represents, it would make no difference whatever in this regard. There is a genuine basis of conviction upon which the movement rests, and men of conviction do not forgo their endeavors because victory is slow to come. What the rest of us have to do is to look at the facts of their progress—or the reverse—as they are, and not as either our wishes or our fears would have them. There has been in this country a great growth of the Socialist vote, and of the Socialist movement in general, during the past decade. This is indisputable. That growth has been more marked in New York City than in any other great centre of population. It would not have been at all surprising if the ferment of the last two years, and the most extraordinary situation in which we are at this moment living, had resulted in a great acceleration of the process. That nothing of the kind has happened is a fair inference from the figures of last week's election. To say more than this would be to go beyond warrant; but this is something quite important enough to remember. When people say that a thing is sure to come, and that it is coming by leaps and bounds already, the fact that it failed to show itself when it had an exceptionally favorable opportunity to do so, may very properly be used to stop the mouths of confident visionaries.

Reports that Call Red Pink

AT a time when the national Government is exposing the widespread activities of radical forces that plot its overthrow and the destruction of our democratic institutions, it is peculiarly mischievous to spread misleading reports, issued in the interest of the Bolshevik propaganda. Such is the character of a series of articles by Isaac Don Levine, a man whose antecedents and connections should suffice for warning to an editor. One of these articles, supplied with the flaring headline: "Red Terror Reign a Fiction," was given the leading place on the front page of the New York Globe. Its manifest object was to enlist sympathy for the bloody and tyrannical rule of the minority that has usurped power in Russia, by spreading the impression that all that has been said about the Russian terror is a mass of lies, and that affairs there are, except for economic distress, in a normal and satisfactory state.

The testimony of hundreds of reliable men, Russians and foreigners alike, who have recently escaped from Bolshevik Russia, is unanimous, and if perchance a few personally conducted correspondents, guests of the Soviet authorities, and seeing only what it pleases these to show them, come out with different stories, it cannot change the verdict. Thus, as regards the Red Terror: Last year, in the early autumn, the Extraordinary Commission against Counter-revolution put into effect a frightful reign of terror directed against the bourgeoisie. This was taken official cognizance of by our own Government and has been frequently admitted by the Bolshevik leaders themselves. As a matter of fact this particular terror was designed to arouse the waning enthusiasm of the proletariat and to furnish a convenient object upon which to vent their dissatisfaction at the unendurable conditions resulting from Bolshevik rule. But since that time there has been put into effect another terror, more horrible and deadly, if less spectacular. This is the terror whereby workmen and peasants alike are cowed into a condition of slavish obedience and the abrogation of all liberty. No one can read of the personal experiences of Mr. H. V. Keeling, the English trade-unionist, of Mr. David Aronson, who served for nine months in the Commissariat of Public Construction, or of Mr. George Lvov, who served both as an engineer and as a Red Army Soldier, and who escaped in September, without realizing that the Bolshevik leaders, supported by an armed minority but hated by the masses, are maintaining their ascendancy only by the application of ruthless terror and that this terror bears most heavily upon the laboring classes. A newspaper charged with the duty of informing American public opinion in this crisis, assumes a heavy responsibility in publishing correspondence whose authenticity and good faith are open to question, and whose purpose is vicious.

Another instance of somewhat similar character may be cited. Not long ago, there appeared in the columns of one of our leading dailies, a long article describing the Fair at Nizhni-Novgorod last summer. It was replete with glowing details concerning the thousands of merchants that visited the Fair, the vast amount of goods sold, and the millions of rubles that these transactions represented. Of course the whole article was a hoax, for no such fair was or could be held in Bolshevik Russia, where trade is nationalized, and production and transportation are in chaos. The newspaper in question promptly admitted that it had been imposed upon and that the whole article was a fraud. But certain "journals of opinion" unblushingly published articles commending the state of affairs in Bolshevik Russia, quoting the article in question as an authority, although the very paper in which it had appeared had repudiated it as containing not a word of truth. It is all very well to give the devil his due, but to give him aid and comfort to which he has no possible claim is going a little too far.

Intellectual Armageddon

THE days when everybody had a Mission—with a big M—have given place to the days of propaganda, with a very small, sly, insinuating, but not silent p. It will be more tolerable, perhaps, when we are all grown more thoroughly used to it. When we are all incorporated into solemn troops and sweet societies, then we shall more readily know the precise rate of discount to be applied to the utterances of each of our rival groups. When no one speaks except from the platform of his own intellectual union, the business of the world will be enormously simplified. Each group casts its vote, a vote indeed that could be pretty certainly predicted, and the mind of the world is swiftly made up. Smaller groups will, perforce, if they are to survive, combine into larger ones, until by necessary evolution the whole world becomes of like mind. About this time may be expected a spirited and probably successful revolt under the banner of a self-reliant individualism.

The present stage of this evolution is in high degree painful to those who are still aware of life as a gracious thing, compounded of such simples as home; the fearful delights of one's own children; the possession of a friend or two with whom one disagrees often in the mind but in the heart never; a garden, maybe, and some books, and an artistic sense that yields a rich return to the possessor if not to the world. Such people are reluctant to heed the summons to intellectual Armageddon. They had supposed that society was good in proportion to the number of well-disposed and self-reliant individuals contained in it. They ardently wished to see the number of such individuals increased, and were prepared to adopt any change in the procedure of life which offered reasonable promise of so increasing it. They had thought of life as something to be lived, and not as an experiment in a laboratory to be taken down and set up afresh whenever it failed to yield at once the desired results.

Least of all do such people have unquestioning faith in the efficacy of banding themselves together in societies that a particular fragment of what looks like the truth may be made to prevail. A wise man, and himself something of a revolutionary in his way, had said it.

In like manner the reformers summon conventions and vote and resolve in multitudes. But not so, O friends! will the God deign to enter and inhabit you, but by a method precisely the reverse.

Organization, of course, is well enough where it serves to multiply the force of the individuals that compose it, but the organization is not stronger or more clear-sighted than its members. The organization that pretends to be so, that asks as a condition of membership any considerable abdication of personal sovereignty, that recruits its strength from those whom it can control but who are not themselves fit to control it, ends by wrecking either itself or the world in which it survives.

Intellectual Armageddon, however, is on. There is no evading it. Not to organize is to be destroyed. But to organize in the wrong way is likewise to court destruction. The things to be defended, the things to be made to prevail, are precisely the things that nobody ever thought of defending before. An atmosphere of assertion, of militancy, of resolute objectivity, the atmosphere, in short, created by talking about them very much, is the one thing that destroys them. They are valuable because they are natural growths and not synthetic confections. They are valuable because they are not asserted or proclaimed or "believed in." Their flavor resides in the fact of their being taken for granted; where reticence is impossible, freedom becomes a mockery.

"Americanism" supplies an instance. Americanism is not a thing, it is a way Americans live. Bolshevism is a thing; Socialism is a thing. But nowhere has Bolshevism or Socialism been successfully lived. One can, and one does, multiply oneself into societies for the establishment of Bolshevism or of Socialism. Or one can excitedly watch others so organizing, and wonder whether the plunge would be as exhilarating as merely thinking about the plunge or telling people who are grossly immersed in mere living what a good time they are missing. It is not hard to defend these things with considerable plausibility, because the people who defend them are merely defending a creation of their own. If a weak spot appears, it is not a difficult matter to shift the ground. In the same way, it is not difficult to become deeply instructed in the shortcomings of life as most people live it. Most people do not make the mistake of expecting too much of life and bear it no grudge because it comes this side of perfection. They are, on the contrary, rather actively, and successfully, on the lookout for its redeeming satisfactions. But they hardly know how to draw up a reasoned defence of their way of life. Their adversaries are better weaponed for attack, and occupy an easier ground to defend. For the Americanism that is what it is because it has been lived by increasing numbers of people these three hundred years, does it not, the moment you form a society to go about actively expressing loyalty to it, tend to lose its essential quality by evaporation?

We would not imply that nothing can be done somewhat to instruct in that mode of life which we call American those among us who do not understand it and who presumably would value it if they could learn to make it their own. But we do mean that such efforts avail little as compared with the results to be attained if each individual who by habit and tradition "demonstrates" Americanism in the life he leads should henceforward make such demonstration more convincing. The efforts of those who would band housewives together in an attempt to reduce first this item that makes up the cost of living, then another and so to end of the list, are pitifully ill-calculated. Mere taking thought will not reduce the cost of living item by item, or as a whole, and in general; it is for the individual to reduce his cost of living, and the only way this can be done is to reduce the number of items, or to substitute for expensive items others that if embraced in the right spirit will yield a return valued for its own sake and not as a mere substitute.

Since, then, intellectual mobilization is decreed, let the fighting be on ground of our own choosing and not of the enemies'. It is useless to contend with a metaphysician in the realm of metaphysics. At best one can set up a rival system more to one's taste. But if meanwhile life is to go forward, there is need now and then of a stout Johnsonian "I refute it thus!" There are some questions, in politics, economics, family life, and individual conduct, as well as in metaphysics, that not only admit no immediate settlement; they are theoretically insoluble; as impossible to resolve as the impact of irresistible force upon an immovable body. Life generally settles these problems by a slow process of starving them out, depriving them of nutrition until they become dry and unregarded husks. It is a costly procedure, blighting many a fair hope and starting many a tear, but it is not nearly so costly as to demand of life that it justify itself completely at each moment of time. Something very like this, in the present stress of things, is being demanded of life. And those to whom life is more precious than any dream of what it ought to be must set themselves the hard task of providing in their own lives that defence by virtue of which alone life itself continues.

The Public and the Packers

THE article on "The Big Five and the Problem of Monopoly," contributed to our columns this week by a highly competent hand, discusses not the effect of monopolistic practices upon prices, but the nature and logical consequences of those practices themselves. Throughout the entire period of the country's struggle with the Trust problem, a period now nearing the close of its third decade, it has been essential, for any just view of the problem, to distinguish sharply between the objections to monopoly as a matter of business relations and of inordinate personal power, and the objections to it as a means of putting extortionate burdens on the consumer. It is with the former aspect almost exclusively that the writer of this article deals in the case of the Big Five.

That the Federal Trade Commission has presented a powerful indictment of the packers—powerful, that is, as to the substantial character of their monopolistic control in a vast field of production and distribution, whatever may be its character as a matter of law—no one can question who either scans the Commission's voluminous report or reads the article in the Review. It is unfortunate, however—to use no harsher term—that the Commission has in various ways lent its weight to the strengthening of the belief, for which there is not, so far as we know, any respectable foundation, that this control is responsible for a considerable part of the high prices of meat products. If the Commission goes into that question at all, its plain duty is to go into it thoroughly and judicially; and in statements intended for publication, it is further the duty of the Commission to bring out the real significance of the figures, instead of throwing them at the public unexplained, or in a form that suggests sensational conclusions.

It was at the very height of the excitement over the President's initiation, three months ago, of a movement to bring down prices, that the Commission, in its letter to him, presented the figures of the packers' profits as follows:

The packers' profits in 1917 were more than four times as great as in the average year before the European war, although their sales in dollars and cents at even the inflated prices of last year had barely doubled. In the war years 1915, 1916, 1917, four of the five packers made net profits of $178,000,000.

This—presented, as it was, without any further analysis or comment—was calculated to produce upon the mind of the wayfaring man the impression of outrageous "profiteering" on the part of the packers and of a terrible burden imposed on the public. But there is nothing abnormal in doubled prices (say) yielding quadrupled profit; and $60,000,000 a year, in a group of businesses covering—as the Commission so strongly insists it does—a large part of the food supply of the whole nation, makes no perceptible addition to the people's cost of living.

But even though there may be little or no basis for the belief that the big packers' hold on production and distribution results in an increase of price to the consumer, the existence of such a state of things as the Commission describes is matter for most serious concern. We cannot view with indifference the indefinite extension of that kind of power in the hands of a few individuals. Restraints must be placed upon it, either in the shape of direct limitation of its scope or in the shape of effective regulation by the Government. If it is practically impossible to make the former method effective, resort must be had to the latter. The comparative merits of the two are indicated with fairness in our contributor's article.

Decentralization in France

TO work! was M. Clémenceau's appeal to his audience at Strassburg. Its impressiveness was not in its originality, for it echoed what other leading statesmen, both in victorious and defeated countries, had been saying with equal emphasis. But it struck home, all over the world, as the word of an octogenarian who, taking his official farewell of France, might have been excused if he had dwelt on the otium cum dignitate that awaited him. He included himself among the workers to whom he appealed on behalf of the country's future: "Let us all work for the greatness and the glory of France."

In the programme which M. Clémenceau outlined, he mentioned, among other things, a scheme to make the French citizen set to work also in the political administration of his country, a field of activity in which he has never exerted himself with much ardor or interest. Clémenceau advocated decentralization of the administration, and a transfer of responsibility for local affairs from the Chamber of Deputies to local assemblies.

This is not a new departure for M. Clémenceau. The lessons of the war may have convinced him of the urgency of this reform, but, if so, they were preached to one long since converted. In the early eighties, when M. Clémenceau was a prominent figure among the Radicals, decentralization was one of the planks in the platform of that party, whose programme was, indeed, identical with that for which the Republicans had stood in the days of Napoleon III. "C'est le drapeau de 1869," said M. Clémenceau in 1881. The Radicals, it is true, had embroidered additional slogans on the banner, such as the abolition of the Presidency and the Senate. For in these, M. Clémenceau explained in 1881, "the monarchical principles, so tenacious of life in the institutions of France," still survived. These words of nearly thirty years ago are no less true at the present day, which sees the radical who wrote them at the head of the Government. The very cause which made him opposed to the Presidency and the Senate kept both institutions intact from the onslaughts of the Radicals. The French are better monarchists than republicans. The political fabric constructed by Napoleon on the remains of the foundations laid by the Ancien Régime owes its solidity and endurance to the people's latent consciousness that it answers the needs of the country. The parliamentary system is a foreign importation, and half a century's practice has not been much to its credit in France, owing to its unfortunate grafting on a centralized administration of native growth.

In France it is not, as in this country, the commune that lends its functionaries to the Government, but the Government that imposes its functionaries on the commune. The defects of such a power, bad enough when placed in the hands of one man, are multiplied to excess by the parliamentary system, as each delegate belonging to the governmental majority becomes a co-dispenser of places in his constituency, and reckons his popularity by the number he can bestow. Weak men, under this system, easily succumb to the temptation to promote the creation of new offices instead of economy. And M. Clémenceau, whose integrity has always made him invulnerable in political combat, is the very man to remind the nation of its duty to stem these abuses by taking a more active part in the administration of the country.

Pessimists hold that any such attempt is bound to miscarry, as they believe the people to be temperamentally unfit for the task. But they do not seem to discriminate between incapacities due to lack of training, and such as have their root in inherited nature. That after fifty years of republicanism the French have not evinced either a desire or a capacity for local autonomy is not sure proof of a native deficiency, but may be due to that latent survival of the monarchical tradition which has debarred them from receiving education in local home-rule. All that we know of the Frenchman's temperament seems to give the lie to that pessimistic doubt. During the war the centralized administration betrayed its inefficiency by its lack of organizing power, and the country was saved by the personal initiative of the individual citizens. The average Frenchman is a personality, quick to respond and ready to act at his own risk—the very reverse of the German, whose initiative needs the stimulant of a superior's command.

The one great obstacle in the way towards administrative decentralization is the approval given to the prevailing system by that class of moulders of public opinion which does not take part in politics—men of letters, men of science, men of business. To these Paris is France, and an administration which answers their notion of the identity of the capital and the country is the best form of government. This sentiment is the strongest ally of the professional politician who, for reasons of self-interest, is opposed to any diminution of parliamentary control of local affairs. To the Frenchman who cherishes that traditional worship of Paris which the reign of Le Roi Soleil inaugurated, M. Clémenceau's plea for decentralization must seem disloyalty to the great capital. Arguments are of little avail against prejudice. If the Premier's plan carries the day, it will be through the dire need of reform arising from the disrupting forces of the war.

"Germany has at least done France one service—she has recalled to Frenchmen their duty towards themselves," M. Clémenceau said in his peroration. If the war will bring home to them the necessity of administrative reform, it will have done them this other service of safeguarding their country's future by defending them against their own love for an obnoxious survival of the past.

The Big Five and the Problem of Monopoly

THE President's obviously hurried attempts to make up for lost time have probably led him to take up arms with labor against the rising price level. It has occurred to some that the revival of the agitation against the packers by the Department of Justice—after the Federal Trade Commission's long-continued attempt to initiate drastic regulatory legislation against them—may be in part attributable to this general fight on prices. Even if this attack is staged for the political effect which it is calculated to have, it represents an interesting phase in the solution of the monopoly problem.

There are two ways in which a powerful producer or group of producers can control prices in an industry: (1) by absorbing all important competitors; (2) by making peace with them so as to induce them to agree to price maintenance. The first method was rendered illegal by the provisions of the Sherman law and the Clayton act. Combination under these laws, however, was not really made impossible because the individual owners of a business, as individuals, were allowed to acquire the stock of competing companies. Thus, the original owners of the old Oil and Tobacco Trusts practically control the dissolved companies, which are supposed to be independent and competing with each other. There was another obstacle in the way of combinations of this kind; with economic development the business units which had to be absorbed increased so in size that one producer or group of producers, no matter how powerful, often found great difficulty in stifling competition. The use of peaceful methods for influencing your enemies to do what you want is often as effective as actual conquest. Thus, the second method of price maintenance has come increasingly into favor because the first involved legal difficulties and required a large amount of capital. Both the trade association activities and the tactics employed by the "Big Five" represent methods of eliminating so-called "cut-throat competition." In the case of the Slaughtering and Packing Industry it might be puzzling to attempt to determine whose throats are most badly cut.

The harmonious relations which exist among "the Packers" may have a certain value, but they are hardly compatible with the fundamental assumptions of the so-called "Competitive System." It was shown by the Federal Trade Commission that: (1) Swift, Armour, Morris, Wilson, and Cudahy agree to divide their live-stock purchases throughout the United States according to certain fixed percentages; (2) these five companies exchange confidential information which is not made available to their competitors, and employ jointly paid agents to secure information which they use to manipulate and control the live-stock markets; (3) these five packers through their buyers act collusively in the purchase of live stock (e. g. by "split shipment" purchases, "part purchases," "wiring on," "making" the daily market); (4) Swift, Armour, Morris, and Wilson through their subsidiary and controlled companies in South America combined with certain other companies to restrict and control shipments of beef and other meats from South America to the United States and other countries; (5) all the five companies act collusively in the sale of fresh meat by exchanging information regarding "margins" realized, by inspection of one another's stocks of fresh meats, and by joint action in underselling independent competitors; (6) there is a joint contribution to funds expended under their secret control to influence public opinion and Government action, and thus maintain the power of the combination; (7) two or more of the five interests have joint ownership or representation in 108 concerns.

The collusive activities of these five apparently separate legal entities present a problem of great difficulty. They cannot be dissolved, inasmuch as there is practically no intercompany stock ownership. They cannot be made to compete unless strict measures for the enforcement of competition be resorted to. The obvious method of restoring competition, where Trust control has destroyed it, always seemed to be dissolution. However, when the Trusts were dissolved the individual owners of the original Trust were allowed to own, as individuals, stocks in the dissolved companies. Thus, dissolution and even the court's dignified exhortation that the different companies should go to and compete did not necessarily effect competition. It is perfectly evident that producers will fare better by agreeing than by competing, particularly in the matter of prices, even if they have had no connection whatever. When the stockholders of all the dominant companies are the same, as in the case of the Standard Oil Companies, it would be palpably absurd to expect

The various bills which have been proposed in the Senate, as a result of the Federal Trade Commission's report on the meat industry, attempt to provide for certain regulations which will encourage competition by making it possible for competitors to live. The bills give the Secretary of Agriculture adequate power, through a licensing system, to keep the law enforced. The provisions are of two kinds: those of the first are little more than mere reiteration of provisions in acts already on the statute books; those of the second were prompted by the Federal Trade Commission's report, which showed that "the Packers" owe their power to their control of the stockyards and to their private cars.

Section 7 of the Kenyon bill gives the general prohibitions:

That it shall be unlawful for any licensee, under section 3 of this Act to—(a) Engage in any unfair, unjustly discriminatory, or deceptive practice or device in commerce; or (b) Sell or otherwise transfer to or for any other such licensee, or buy or otherwise receive from or for any other such licensee, any live stock or live-stock products for the purpose of apportioning the supply between any such licensees, or unreasonably affecting the price of or creating a monopoly in the acquisition of, buying, selling, or dealing in, live stock or live-stock products, in commerce; or (c) Engage or participate in any manner, either directly or indirectly, in the business of purchasing, manufacturing, storing, or selling any foodstuffs other than live-stock products, where the effect of such participation in such business may be to substantially lessen competition, or to restrain commerce, or to tend to create a monopoly in any line of foodstuffs; or (d) Conspire, combine, agree, or arrange with any other such licensee to apportion territory for carrying on business, or to apportion purchases or sales of any live stock or live-stock products, or to control prices thereof, in commerce; or (e) Conspire, combine, agree, or arrange with any other such licensee to engage in any course of business in commerce; or (f) Otherwise act or refuse, neglect or fail to act, or conspire, combine, agree, or arrange with any other person to do or aid or abet the doing of any act contrary to the provisions of this Act and the regulation made hereunder.

The provisions of the Kenyon bill which seem to have been prompted by the Commission's recommendations are found in Section 14.

It shall be the duty of every licensee in this section—(a) To provide and maintain or secure, when necessary and practicable, adequate railroad connections with his place of business; (b) To furnish the services and facilities of his business on fair and reasonable terms and without unjust discrimination to persons applying for the same: Provided, That he shall set aside such portion of the facilities of his business, as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture, as may reasonably be necessary to accommodate small shippers and local patrons; (c) To impose only such charges and rates as are reasonable for the service or facility afforded; (d) To exercise such care of the live stock, live-stock products, or perishable foodstuffs handled by him as may be necessary to prevent undue loss in connection therewith; (c) To maintain sanitary conditions in the conduct of his business; (f) To refrain from unfairly discriminatory or deceptive practices or devices in the conduct of his business; (g) To keep complete and accurate accounts and records of his business and to submit reports when called for in such form as may be prescribed by the Secretary; and (h) Otherwise to conduct his business in such manner as may be prescribed in regulations issued under this section by the Secretary to carry out the purposes thereof.

The Federal Trade Commission's recommendations for regulating "the Packers" and the proposed legislation in Congress represent considerable advancement over the court decrees of 1911. The Standard Oil Company of New Jersey and the American Tobacco Company were two great holding companies that controlled practically all of the other powerful companies in the oil and tobacco industries by the ownership of controlling interests in their capital stocks. The dissolution decrees of 1911 merely transferred the control of the industry from the original holding company, as a company, to its stockholders. Although the owners of the original Tobacco Trust were not allowed to hold so large a part in the companies formed at the time of the dissolution as they had owned in the original holding company, the control was never really dispersed. The Commission showed in its report on the price of gasoline in 1915 that there was no real competition between the different companies of the Standard Oil group, especially in the case of gasoline. Although the Bureau of Corporation's report on the Tobacco Industry was probably written too soon after the dissolution to furnish any very satisfactory information with regard to its effect, there is little reason to believe that the court decree brought about greater competition than had existed before 1911.

Economists will probably realize that the attack on "the Packers" constitutes an interesting development in the treatment of the problem of monopoly. It may be advisable to regulate, but to leave intact, the large-scale business units that prove to be efficient because of their size. The Commission maintained that the "Big Five" exhibited no exceptional efficiency, but was apparently unable to adduce statistical evidence for the proof of this contention. The Government-controlled monopoly has come to be recognized as a better solution of the Trust problem than dissolution and the establishment of legally separate companies that have so great a community of interest. The licensing proposed for "the Packers" and for the other food-producing companies will undoubtedly seem irksome, but American business will have to become accustomed to supervision.

Woman—The Citizen

AFTER a long and arduous struggle, lasting over seventy years, millions of women are now voting. What of these newly enfranchised citizens? What is the largest opportunity at hand? What is the greatest and most immediate service they can render?

Viewed in the light of reaction from the political campaign just ended, it would seem that they are lined up in two great partisan camps scarcely to be distinguished from the men. The two great political parties, with their already existing powerful partisan machinery, eagerly reached out and gathered in every possible woman in sight, and unless women had done that impossible and undesired thing—organize their own political party—such alignment was inevitable. The alignment, however, definitely disposes of the fear sometimes expressed by men that the woman vote en bloc might constitute a menace if controlled by sinister elements. And, fortunately, with the winning of the vote there also disappeared from the situation that particular type of suffragist who was wont to tap some unprotected male on his coat button and say warningly: "Ah, but we shall change all that when we have the vote!"

Some of us knew better all the time, and now—since we have not yet a new heaven and a new earth, but on the contrary are confronted by the greatest menace ever known in our history, with Bolshevism seeking to destroy the very fabric of government itself, anarchy let loose in the ranks of industry, the Red forces of destruction at the throat of law and order—what may woman, the citizen, do, and do most quickly, to steady the ship of state?

There is one important and necessary thing to be done at once, done by concerted patriotic action without regard to party lines. We are immediately confronted with the impressive statement issued by the Senate Committee on Education and Labor that there are more than ten million persons in the United States who cannot speak, read, or write the English language. To meet this situation it is proposed to appropriate immediately five million dollars for the rest of the fiscal year, and the sum of twelve millions annually thereafter to be used and distributed by the Department of the Interior to educate illiterates. The theory of this bill, as outlined by the Committee, is that this Government recognition will stimulate the various States to adopt compulsory teaching of English to illiterates and foreigners. The need of this initial step may perhaps be further emphasized by the fact that there are at present fifty-four foreign language publications in New York City, many of them of dangerous Bolshevik or anarchistic tendency, and a number known to be financially supported by wealthy patrons, both men and women. A truly interesting list, one surmises, and were the fierce light of publicity to beat upon it the public might be the gainer thereby, for it is especially significant that a large part of this vicious propaganda is nurtured in drawing-rooms of more or less social prominence, and some of it has the support of persons commanding not a little political influence.

It is with deep gratification, therefore, that one turns to such work of coöperation with the Government as the National Security League and the American Defense Society, both nation-wide in scope, the former with a membership of eighty-five thousand, and the latter with sixty thousand, and each with its women members running into the thousands and actively engaged in practical educational work. The great service rendered by these two national organizations during the war will be readily recalled by every one, and their membership and their activity might well be increased by thousands of women who could assist the Government with a patriotism entirely free from politics and thoroughly constructive in effect. The excellent Americanization work already done by these two societies is to be carried on in an extended campaign next year along practical lines and coöperating fully with the Government plan, a work in which every loyal American woman may well have a share.

Such a great coördinated movement carries within itself a stabilizing influence on the present almost chaotic state of the industrial world, and it is with deep pleasure that one notes a new but important organization in the national field, The National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, which held its first convention at St. Louis last July. It is already a significant national group, entirely distinct from the General Federation of Women's Clubs and the National Women's Trade Union League, and composed wholly of independent, individualistic women, many of them highly trained and representing over forty vocations. Just how timely this particular organization happens to be may perhaps be indicated by the fact that although it is known that the number of such women runs into the millions, the organizers of the League were unable to discover, either in the Library of Congress or in the Council of National Defense, any lists of business or professional women's clubs. It was to remedy this trifling oversight that special organizers were sent out all over the country to locate such clubs and to organize new ones, with the result that forty-three States were represented by delegates at the St. Louis convention. This league lives up to its name, for a condition of membership is that the club must have at least seventy-five per cent. of business and professional women before it is eligible for admission. The Federation is non-political (one is deeply grateful it does not say "non-partisan") non-sectarian, and self-supporting. It proposes to secure a more combined action by business and professional women to gather and distribute information and to offer channels of activity and service of national scope.

In the year since the signing of the armistice the crisis in the industrial situation, caused by the destructive forces that are seeking to annihilate government everywhere, has resulted in an alarming decrease of production. Of direct practical bearing at the moment, therefore, are two outstanding objects of the Federation: To raise the standards of commercial achievement, and to increase production throughout the business world. When it is remembered that these women are already active producers and not given to idle words, it is not surprising to hear that this new organization has had the cordial approval of leading men all over the country, while in some of the Western cities the Federation will cooperate with chambers of commerce in important civic work.

Women's activities in patriotic endeavor have naturally not kept up with the pace which was set in their war work. Yet this is no season for idling. Women have it in their power by well-directed organization to aid enormously in the campaign to defeat the movement of the Reds in this country. Next year comes the tercentenary of the landing of the Pilgrims; the blessings of liberty which they bestowed upon us are seriously threatened. We are challenged to defend them; we, too, must do a work that will last for three hundred years.

Learning the Tricks of the Revolution

THE United States discovered Western Europe with the war and Eastern Europe with the armistice. Our tuition in the problems of Eastern Europe during the armistice followed as a necessary consequence of the pouring out of our resources in the cause of the Allies since the earliest days of the great conflict. While the European Allies were relaxing their energies from November 11 on, the United States was called upon to put full war energy into the economic factor of peace-making until the signing of the peace with Germany. The practical significance of this was, first, that we were some three-quarters of a year later than the European Allies in feeling the effects of that relaxation of effort that in Europe followed immediately after the signing of the armistice; and, second, that this longer period of war strain enabled some thousands of our fellow citizens to observe Europe in her throes of post-war reorganization, to have some experience in the handling of social uprisings, and to learn that much that passes for revolution is as likely as not to be simply social hysteria.

I imagine the average citizen looks upon the American Relief Administration as simply another of our American institutions for "doing good" to a needy and decrepit Europe. An institution for doing good it indeed was. It was fundamental in the rehabilitation of liberated Europe. But in the present state of American affairs it is better to consider this organization as one of the most remarkable educational enterprises in history for informing Americans on the present problems of Europe and on the impending problems of America.

The American Relief Administration in Europe numbered about fifteen hundred men. It covered in its field of operation two-thirds of Europe outside of Russia, an area equal to about the area east of the Mississippi. In this area the American Relief Administration served some seventeen different nationalities, of a population of one hundred and twenty-five millions, which were representative of the four hundred and fifty millions of Europe as a whole. Over this field the American Relief Administration spread like an army. It had its own lines of communication, its own ports, its own transportation system; it exercised "benevolent mandates" over river shipping on the Danube and over railroads in Austria; it had its fleet of some three hundred ships. The general headquarters of this relief army was at Paris; division headquarters were at Vienna, Warsaw, Trieste, Bucharest, and elsewhere. Like a true army, however, the real work was done by the men in the field. The soldiers of this relief army were scattered along the fringe of social unrest in Europe; they were a combined

Europe was in that abnormal condition which was the normal result of the great cataclysm it had passed through. Nothing could have been more normal, in the sense of expected, than this state of unrest in Europe after the war. The great enclosed area between the active belligerents in the West and the Russian border had been subjected to the hunger pressure. As a measure of war making, Germany and France had protected their food supplies. But the great central area, including the states of old Austria, new Poland, Rumania, Serbia, and the Baltic Provinces, being of minor importance in the fighting, were left with dwindling resources, and there the first social results of the hunger pressure were found. Bolshevism ran a wedge into Hungary and got a foothold on the north fringes abutting on Russia. The Americans pushed bridgeheads into the chaos; they delivered food; they established transportation by rail and river. Through their advantageous position as neutrals and friends, they were able to effect exchanges by which resources were equalized. Above all, they observed and studied the ways of revolution under the pressure of anxiety and diminished resources. They found that under this mysterious hunger pressure the animosities of war had been forgotten overnight and that new animosities of more elemental nature had taken their place. The district that had nothing had no enemies. Austria which had been denuded had some sympathy. But woe to the nation that had more than its share of railroad cars, oil, locomotives, or coal. The districts of Teschen in Silesia and the Banat of Temesvar became sore spots on the map, contended for by all arguments of sentiment, of language ties, and of geography, but coveted for the underlying reason that one was rich in coal, the other rich in wheat.

The Americans found that when hunger began to work, there could be a dozen sides to an argument and every side could be right. A Relief Administration man did not stay in a place a week without becoming an enthusiastic partisan of the people with whom he worked. He understood their problems, their fears, and their strivings. He came to see that these people were not so very different from Americans; that, in fact, they were the racial brothers of the Americans with whom he was wont to work in New York and Chicago and Pittsburgh.

I am not going to draw the parallel between Europe after the war and America after the armistice. We have just come to the point at which, as the result of the pouring out of our resources to Europe, we, too, are beginning to feel the pinch of lessening resources. Like Europe, we are feeling some of the resultant social reaction. Unlike Europe, our fundamental position is sound. We need only to gird ourselves for the proper exploitation of our natural powers. But our problem no longer differs in kind from that of Europe. It only differs in degree. It was good for Europe to have Hoover and Gregory and Heinz and Haskell and several hundred of their associates and subordinates work for the rehabilitation of Europe. The wisdom and experience Americans have gained abroad will not be without their advantages at home.

Partly through the help of the Americans, hunger was put off in Central Europe and the trend is now again toward increased production. The present winter will be a hard one in Austria, only less hard in Czechoslovakia and Poland; but the direction is upward. There was never much danger of Bolshevism in Rumania and Jugoslavia. That danger has passed for Poland, Bohemia, and German Austria.

What Americans have done for Europe they can do for our own country. These men had to take continually the attitude that Europe is not "going to the dogs," and they had to act on this theory and lend money on it. Manifestly, it is quite safe to say that America is not "going to the dogs."

Ethics and Politics of the Treaty Wrangle

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

I read with some amazement in your last number: "If the treaty should then fail for want of a two-thirds vote, the Democratic Senators who voted against it would be fully justified in placing the blame for failure upon the Republican marplots who had wantonly piled up needless and fatal objections to its adoption." You will pardon a devoted reader for saying that this is bad politics and worse morals. You are justifying the Democratic minority in assuming to speak for the Treaty Powers, a purely diplomatic judgment which is not within the proper purview of the Senate; you are assuming, contrary to the general temper of your article, that the Republican reservationists are dishonest and perverse and liable to discipline by the Democrats; finally you are sanctioning a quite ignoble bluff of Senator Hitchcock's.

It is not the business of the Senate to guess how far the Treaty Powers will accede to American modifications of the Covenant. That is the President's business. If he regards the treaty as fatally mangled, it is his Constitutional right to let it die in the files of the State Department. He, too, as a matter of judgment, should be chary of denying to the Treaty Powers an opportunity to accept the treaty even if considerably modified. Nothing is to be gained by treating the reservationists as mere marplots. Apparently the friends of the Treaty are in a mood to sacrifice the off chance that the other Powers will accept the reservations to the punitive tactics of putting the Republicans in a hole.

I hold no brief for the Republicans, whose policy has seemed to me stupid in the extreme, but I cannot admit the principle that when a majority of the Senate has modified a treaty, a smaller majority is at liberty to wreck it out of spite. The President is the sole judge whether the rehandling of a treaty by the Senate has nullified it or not. For the Senate to amend and forthwith reject a treaty would be an evident self-stultification. There is no straight course except to send the Treaty with the reservations to the President and let him exercise his Constitutional discretion.

It is a regret to me to find you most uncharacteristically countenancing the small politics that Senator Hitchcock is willing to play at the world's expense. Has your zeal for the softest reservations impaired your usual fairness? From the point of view of the honest reservationist, stiff reservations are necessary. Even in the Senate no one consciously battles de minimis. When have the Treaty Powers authorized Mr. Hitchcock and his Democratic colleagues to speak for them? When has the President vested Mr. Hitchcock with the treaty-quashing power?

FRANK JEWETT MATHER, JR.
Princeton, N. J., November 5

[When Senator Hitchcock was threatening rejection of the Treaty if reasonable reservations were incorporated in the act of ratification, we regarded the threat as a bluff, and said so. Mr. Mather may be right in his belief that this is true also of Hitchcock's attitude toward the Lodge Committee's reservations, but we see no reason to think so. If he and the Democratic Senators who follow his lead do really "regard the Treaty as fatally mangled," it is their "Constitutional right," as well as the President's, to refuse to put upon it the seal of their approval. The refusal would in that case not rest simply upon a guess as to "how far the Treaty Powers will accede to American modifications of the Covenant," but quite as much upon the conviction that if the League is reduced to futility as a means of promoting peace it is undesirable for the United States to become a member of it at all. Whether, when finally confronted with the inexorable necessity of saying yes or no to an unalterable proposal, the Democratic Senators ought not to say yes in spite of all objections, is a question which we were not undertaking to settle in the remarks to which Professor Mather objects.

We have never intended to charge the Republican reservationists with being dishonest. If, instead of referring to their course as wanton, we had spoken of it as stupid, which Professor Mather himself does, we should perhaps have expressed our meaning better. But as for the other epithet, it is unfortunately only too true that a man may, without being dishonest, be very much of a marplot.

Unsympathetic Towards the President

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Republicans of the Roosevelt-Root following are generally unsympathetic towards personalities like that of President Wilson, but that is no reason why they should not protest against the highly improper tone of the utterances of Mr. Jessup, published in your last issue. After making allowances for the letter, saturated with spleen, I am still puzzled to understand the insinuation contained in the italicized innuendo in its last paragraph. It has no relish of an attack in the open, but looks more like sniping from behind a tree.

A Correction

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

A typographical error occurring in one of the last paragraphs of my article on "What Is Happening Around Riga?" unfortunately makes some of my conclusions rather obscure. I should be very much obliged if you would insert in a future issue the following correction:

In column two of page 560 before the sentence beginning with the words, "It is difficult to suppose that von der Goltz," etc., the following sentence should be inserted:

"On the other hand, some observers are inclined to believe that the German movement in the Baltic is connected in some way with a movement for political reaction in Germany herself."

China's Foreign Relations

THE INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS OF THE CHINESE EMPIRE. By H. B. Morse. New York: Longmans, Green and Company.

FEW countries, even of the West, have had the history of their foreign relations so minutely and accurately presented as China now has since the appearance of the second and third volumes of Mr. H. B. Morse's work. Though filling three substantial volumes, the period covered is barely three-quarters of a century and the account leaves untreated the years since the overthrow of the Manchu Monarchy in 1911 and the establishment of the Republic in its place. These last eight years will furnish in themselves material for another volume, but in the circumstances it is sure to be even more discouraging than its predecessors to those who wish to see China become a politically prosperous and independent state. Mr. Morse devotes each of his volumes to a distinct period which, in each case, he is able to label with a fairly correct descriptive title. The first period, from 1834 to 1860, covered by volume one, he entitles "The Period of Conflict"; the second period, from 1861 to 1893, covered by volume two, is named "The Period of Submission"; the third period, from 1894 to 1912, covered by volume three, is designated as "The Period of Subjection." If, as is to be hoped, Mr. Morse is led to prepare a fourth volume for the years since 1912, he will have to seek a title that is still more indicative of China's national humiliation, for though she has thus far managed to avoid that "Breakup" which seemed imminent in the closing years of the nineteenth century, and to escape from the ranks of monarchies, her political prospects, both international and domestic, have become steadily worse since she took the precipitate plunge into the troubled, if stimulating, waters of democracy.

It is scarcely possible to comment except in very general terms upon the manner in which Mr. Morse has accomplished his task. It will perhaps be most satisfactory, therefore, after giving a comprehensive estimate of the value and character of the work as a whole, to devote the space that remains to characterizing in a broad way the manner in which China has been dealt with by the Powers which have insisted upon having relations with her.

Speaking thus generally, it may be said that Mr. Morse's volumes excel in the patient and accurate manner in which the details of China's peculiarly complicated international relations have been handled, but that they are disappointing in the larger generalizations and deductions that might have been founded upon facts so painstakingly presented. Indeed, in many places Mr. Morse surrenders the rôle of a true historian and is content to be scarcely more than an annalist. There is also some lack of proportion. For example, the Boxer episode, important as it was, scarcely deserves the two hundred pages that are devoted to it, as compared with the one hundred pages that are spared for the events from 1901 to 1912, which include, among others, the important treaties of 1902 and 1903 with Great Britain, the United States, and Japan, and the Russo-Japanese war. In this conflict, China was not a party belligerent, but it was fought upon her soil and involved the future status of three of her Provinces. Then, too, important as was the work of Sir Robert Hart, as Inspector-General of the Chinese Maritime Customs, undue attention is devoted by Mr. Morse to him and to his opinions. At times Mr. Morse, leaving the field of international relations, enters that of China's domestic concerns, but no one will find fault at this for, in the first place, a knowledge of these concerns, in at least their broader aspects, is a prerequisite to an understanding of China's foreign affairs; and, in the second place, the information which Mr. Morse thus supplies regarding China's system of government and administration, her problems of revenue and taxation, her railway and postal developments, and the organization and operation of her imperial maritime customs service, is of such value to students of Far Eastern politics, and treats of matters regarding which it is so difficult to obtain accurate data, that the chapters embodying it are especially welcome. These and other topics, it may be remembered, Mr. Morse had previously treated in his much appreciated volume "The Trade and Administration of China," first published in 1907, and, to a considerable extent, his chapters upon the same subjects in his "International Relations" are borrowed from that book.

Dropping now the rôle of the reviewer and assuming that of the inquiring reader, it will be of interest to state the general impression which one gains from Mr. Morse's account, of the manner in which China has been dealt with by the Powers. One dominating characteristic at once appears: that, almost uniformly, the Powers have sought their own commercial and political interests without primary regard for the interests of the Chinese people or the wishes of their Government. In 1842, by the Treaty of Nanking, China was obliged to agree that foreigners, trading in China, should have definite legal rights, that their foreign consular officials might be stationed at certain ports and have extra-territorial jurisdiction over their respective nationals; and also that the customs duties on exports and imports should be made certain and not to exceed an ad valorem charge of five per cent. From this exceedingly onerous restriction upon her revenue-raising powers China has never since been able to escape. By the treaties of 1858 additional ports were opened to foreign trade and, for the first time, the right given to foreign nations to maintain diplomatic establishments at Peking. At this time also, rights of inland navigation were granted, missionaries given greater freedom to carry on their work throughout the Empire, and a passport system provided for persons desiring to travel in the interior. From time to time, by other treaties, new treaty ports have been opened, until now there are between seventy and eighty of them; extra-territorial rights have been broadened, and new "settlements" or "concessions" in the larger cities created within which the foreigners practically govern themselves, maintaining their own police forces and systems of municipal government.

Still further in derogation of China's independence of action has been the establishment of "spheres of interest," claimed by the several Powers, which, while nominally involving only matters of economic or financial preference, have, in fact, carried with them political implications of the gravest character. But, not content with this, in 1898 Germany demanded of China the lease for ninety-nine years of the important port of Tsingtao, together with a certain amount of surrounding territory, upon terms which, during the running of the lease, transferred to Germany the exercise, if not the actual ownership, of all rights of sovereignty. This led to a demand for similar leases upon the part of Great Britain, Russia, France, and Italy—demands which China was able to refuse only in the case of Italy. And, to make matters still worse, in 1900 came the Boxer troubles, as a result of which China was obliged to make new concessions, and to promise large pecuniary indemnities, for the payment of which she was forced to pledge her two most certain and considerable sources of revenue, the salt taxes (gabelle) and the maritime customs. Before this, China had already created a national indebtedness to meet the indemnity imposed in favor of Japan by the Treaty of Shimonoseki, which closed the Sino-Japanese war. As a result of that disastrous conflict China had been obliged to renounce all suzerain rights over Korea, and to cede to her victorious foe the island of Formosa lying off her southern coast. By the intervention of Russia, Germany, and France she was able to retain the Liaotung Peninsula with the harbor Port Arthur, but soon was compelled to lease this strategic point to Russia and, after the Russo-Japanese war, to consent to the transference of this lease to Japan, who, in the meantime, had become dominant in Korea.

America has never sought for territorial rights in China, has never had or asked for a special sphere of interest, has now not a single "concession" or "settlement" of her own in a Chinese city, and has repeatedly brought to bear all the moral influence, and political influence short of war, which she has been able to exert, in order to preserve China against dismemberment or the impairment of her sovereign right to conduct her own domestic affairs free from foreign dictation or control. As against a régime of commercial, financial, and industrial preferences and discriminations, the American Government has sought to establish and maintain the "open door" of equal opportunity to the nationals of all the Treaty Powers. The only valid criticisms that may be made of the conduct of the United States towards China and the other Powers is that at times she has not pressed her policies with sufficient firmness, and that upon one occasion by her action brought about the defeat of the very end she had in view. This was in 1913, when President Wilson informed American bankers that they could not count upon the support of the American Government with regard to certain loans to China that were then in contemplation, because there were attached to them conditions that were regarded as in violation of China's administrative integrity. The result was that the American bankers withdrew from the Six Power Consortium and the remaining Powers were left to negotiate with China free from whatever restraining influence America might have exerted. By this act, instead of gaining "face" with the Chinese, America lost considerable prestige. It may also be observed that, however considerate the acts of the American Government toward that of China may have been, its conduct towards the Chinese in or entering America has been by no means one to be proud of. We are obliged to confess that in at least one instance, by a Chinese exclusion act of Congress, we violated a subsisting treaty with China, and in numerous instances we have not given to the Chinese residents here that degree of protection against violence to which they were entitled, nor have we effectively punished those who have wronged them in person and property.

Great Britain first obtained Chinese territory when, in 1842, the island of Hong Kong was ceded to her. And since then she has obtained the Kowloon strip along the neighboring mainland. She also holds a lease of the port of Wei-hai-wei, and has a "sphere of interest" that includes the valley of the Yangtze River. But, from the beginning, Hong Kong has been an "open port," and has been a great commercial benefit to all nations trading with China as well as to China herself. Wei-hai-wei was leased as an offset to the lease of Kiaochow to Germany; it has never been fortified, no railway concessions are joined with it, and Great Britain neither claims nor has ever exercised any special political or even commercial privileges in the Province of Shantung, in which the leased area is situated. In her "sphere of interest," and generally with regard to the railways constructed under British auspices, political ambitions, as distinguished from commercial and financial interests, have played no important part.

The same cannot be said of the French concessions in the South. France has a "sphere of interest" in the Provinces of Yunnan and Kwangsi and part of Kwangtung, and also has her eyes turned toward the great Szechuan Province, and her policy of economic penetration in these regions has been more or less tinged with a political purpose. At any rate, the loans which she has made for the construction of railways have carried with them forms of control which have looked not so much to the protection of the funds invested as to the control of the operation of the railways. And, however private upon their face, French foreign loans, as is well known, are strictly controlled by the French Government and made ancillary to foreign policies. Yet it cannot be said that French political ambitions in the Far East at the present time seriously threaten the sovereignty or even the territorial integrity of China.

Russian ambitions in the Far East, at least since 1898, have been strongly political in character. They have not threatened the independence of China but they have endangered the continuance of China's control over the vast Manchurian and Mongolian areas. As a result of her war with Japan, Russia was obliged to abandon all efforts to control Korea and to withdraw from South Manchuria and the Liaotung peninsula, but she remained entrenched in North Manchuria and, until the overthrow of the Czardom, was rapidly obtaining political paramountcy in Mongolia.

It is not until we come to consider the policies which Japan has pursued that we have to deal with a nation whose political ambitions are directly dangerous to the continued independence and autonomy of China. This is a topic which of late has been so much dwelt upon in

There are, however, certain points that need to be emphasized in order that the whole situation may be understood. Japan's political ambitions threaten the territorial integrity of China if not the sovereignty of that country. That is to say, Japan desires, and at times has officially demanded, not simply special economic interests in portions of China—Manchuria, Eastern Inner Mongolia, Shantung, and Fukien—but political paramountcy in those regions. There is also abundant reason for holding that she desires to exercise a generally controlling influence over the national Government at Peking. Within her several "spheres of interest" Japan has, to a very considerable extent, refused to recognize the legitimate political rights of the Chinese local authorities. Within those same regions Japan has violated the spirit, if not the letter, of the open door policy, adherence to which she has repeatedly affirmed.

China at the present time is in a politically demoralized condition—a demoralization that has steadily increased during recent years. There is little hope that her finances, her currency, her railways, and her administrative services generally, can be put upon an effective working basis, without foreign aid that will carry with it a considerable amount of foreign overhead administrative control. Unless this aid is supplied by the Western Powers, it is practically certain that Japanese control, in the interest of Japan and not, primarily, at least, of China, will result.

It is well within the right of Japan to object to the increase in China of foreign control that conceivably may at some time prove a military menace to herself. To this extent she is entitled to a "Monroe Doctrine." Upon this ground she was justified in opposing the increase of Russian influence in Korea, just as the United States was unwilling that French troops should remain in Mexico. But this principle of national self-defence did not justify the annexation of Korea at a time when there appeared to be no danger that, if this were not done, the country would pass into the possession of another strong military Power; nor does it furnish any basis for a claim by Japan to special political or economic interests in China or elsewhere in Asia.

Finally, in judging the political ambitions of Japan, it is essential, from the Western point of view; that weight should be given to the fact that Japan's Government is strongly monarchical, that in its operation the militarists and bureaucrats exert great influence, and that the dominant political philosophy is of the Prussian type. Japan's imperialistic policy is centered in the Far East and looks to the establishment of a true Japanese hegemony in Eastern Asia. The ambition is even larger than the effective control of China proper—it includes as well Mongolia and Siberia as far west as Lake Baikal. It is with Japan's imperialistic desires in the Far East that her policies and those of America stand squarely in opposition.

W. W. WILLOUGHBY

THROTTLED. By Thomas J. Tunney. Boston: Small, Maynard and Company.

COMPARED with what was anticipated before America entered the war, the result of the work of German spies in this country was almost insignificant. Our final adhesion to the Allied cause put all Americans on their guard; enabled us to intern a good part, if not enough, of those who were suspected; prevented the wholesale transfer of German money to America to use in propaganda; and brought out the enthusiastic loyalty of some German-Americans to their adopted country, and what might be called the formal or negative loyalty of the large majority. Whatever was in their hearts, and it must often have been sorrow and bitterness, the great army of Fritzes and Karls and Johanns failed completely to live up to the expectation of the Fatherland, because they did not and would not strike their adopted fatherland.

It thus comes about that a history of the German spy activities in America has to do with a comparatively few men. This fact is made clear by Inspector Tunney. He set out to tell a few stories of the rounding up of German plotters and succeeded in producing a readable book. That is about all that can be said for it. Except for a few details and the differences in point of view between a detective and a reporter there is very little that is new in the book—and, on the whole, the reporter's point of view is quite as interesting as the detective's. More or less unconsciously, however, Inspector Tunney brings out an interesting psychological fact. The German spies seem to have been actuated very much more by desire for cash or for personal glory than by the much vaunted, willing self-sacrifice in the cause of the Fatherland. There is something very melodramatic or else something very mean about all these German plotters. If they fail to draw their pay, they turn state's evidence. They are full of advice to others about unremitting service to Germany, but if they are caught they willingly involve others and betray their cause to save themselves; and even in times of individual success one feels that they are chiefly concerned with possible decorations or bonuses.

The preface of the book, by Arthur Woods, gives a few words of sound common sense that should be reiterated again and again. He speaks with authority both on the police force and on the intelligence service. "We must not again be caught napping with no adequate national intelligence organization. The several Federal bureaus should be welded into one, and that one should be eternally and comprehensively vigilant." This has not been accomplished, and it should be without delay. One feels that Inspector Tunney, good man that he evidently is, never had a fair show. He was a New York policeman, and he had no authority to arrest a man making bombs in New Jersey. He should have been one of a nation-wide, unified Federal force, acting with intelligence and with power. In peace as well as in war we need such a force, and in these days of unrest more than ever; not an inquisitorial force, the tool of any faction of the people, but a force working for the whole people. The poor man needs protection against anarchists as much as the rich man, and a far-seeing intelligence service would do more than spy out crime. It would give warning of the misunderstandings that menace this nation as they do the nations of Europe and that, when acted on in time, will prove only passing shadows across the real progress of a united and comprehending people.

Life's Fitful Fever

MARY OLIVIER: A LIFE. By May Sinclair. New York: The Macmillan Company.

IS the main trouble with our Anglo-American realism that so much of it is "uncompromising,"—aggressively and uneasily opposed to whatever the thing may be that is not realism? Always our Georgian joy seems based on scorn. Life, vaunted tilting-ground for free and exultant spirits, is always revealing itself as the same old fiercely-trodden graveyard of Victorian shams. We cannot, like the Latins, go blithely about our business. We protest too much. We strain the point of gaiety because we so resent the gnawings of conscience, or, as we prefer to put it, the inhibitions of hypocrisy. There is something gloomy and acrid about our outpourings, even when we fancy them to be flowing clear and sweet. We are so "sore" about yesterday that we cannot freely savor today.

Sinclair's latest story, or chronicle, is of before-the-war substance and quality. It is explicitly dated—1865-1910. Moreover, it is most recognizably the kind of thing which represented the culminating phase of that period. This is neither for nor against it; but helps place it. It belongs to the age of Wells and Beresford and Cannan and Mackenzie and Bennett; an age of restless disclaimers, of feverish self-searching, of darting quest among men and objects and places familiar and unfamiliar, like the weaving search of a clever puppy for its master—for its own personal possession by that name. Mary Olivier is an Englishwoman of "temperament," extremely conscious of self, intensely concerned with the world as a setting and an arena for self. The fragmentary jottings or entries in these pages constitute a diary-like record—partly in the first person, partly in the third, now in the present tense, now in the past—of her mental and emotional life from the first memories of childhood to that moment when in middle age she in some sense "finds herself," or the necessary something greater than herself, and so brings this chronicle of pursuit to a natural period. That is, if you believe that she has really found or is capable of finding anything permanently stable and satisfying. Mary Olivier professes to have found peace, before we part with her. But a peace upon which one hurls oneself, in which one wallows with cries of triumph, may easily be given another name. "Unquiet" is the word for this whole school of imaginative, or fanciful writing. An immense eagerness, a fierce inquiry, a blazingly honest intention of getting at "the truth," at all costs, and an overwhelming conviction that one's own bootstraps are the only tools provided by God or man to that end—this is the note of our Georgian and early-Wilsonian commentary. Everything but repose, everything but continence, everything but reliance upon the mental and moral wisdom of the ages. What is history but a dull conspiracy to conceal from us that we are alive? What is common sense but a jail for originality? What is continence but a fetish of Victorian hypocrisy?

Here am I, Mary Olivier, a person, a quivering ego, born in England of the sixties. My father is a ruthless sensualist and domestic tyrant, my mother a slothful dweller in the harem. Nobody loves me. I suffer. I am clever, I seize avidly upon learning. I win distinction as translator of Euripides. I am versed in modern philosophy. I am to be known as a poet. But in my own private life I grope and wander after I know not what. I am bound to the foolish woman who is my mother. Clinging to my conventional fidelity to her, I feel myself free of other conventions. In my late thirties I love and am loved at last. My lover urges marriage, but I will not marry him. He could not be happy with my foolish mother, and her I cannot leave. At forty-five I willingly become his mistress for a brief time. But this cannot last, nor can I marry him. I send him away. At last my foolish mother dies, and a few days later I learn that my lover is married to one whom he does not profess to love. I suffer. Then quite suddenly comes the revelation, the clear discovery of a truth dimly apprehended in childhood but later let slip:

"All her life she had gone wrong about happiness. She had attached it to certain things and certain people. . . . And in the end none of these things had brought her the happiness she had seemed to foresee in them. . . . She knew only one thing about perfect happiness; it didn't hide; it didn't wait for you behind unknown doors. There were little happinesses, pleasures that came like that. . . . If you looked back on any perfect happiness you saw that it had not come from the people or the things you thought it had come from, but from somewhere inside yourself. When you attached it to people and things they ceased for that moment to be themselves, the space they then seemed to inhabit was not their own space; the time of the wonderful event was not their time. They became part of the kingdom of God within you."

So at last Mary Olivier has found for herself the way out, through "the Thing-in-Itself, Reality, God." Not that she has got any sort of recognizable faith or religion. The charm and triumph of it lies precisely in the fact that it is not the usual kind of thing: "The Christians got hold of real things and turned them into something unreal, impossible to believe. The grace of God was a real thing. It was that miracle of perfect happiness, with all its queerness, its divine certainty and uncertainty. The Christians knew at least one thing about it; they could see that it had nothing to do with deservings. But it had nothing to do with believing, either, or with being good and getting into heaven. It was heaven. It had to do with beauty, absolutely unmoral beauty more than anything else." In such fashion does our brilliant middle-aged Englishwoman, with her quivering nerves and vibrating intelligence, fashion (like Mr. Wells) a God and a heaven not, perhaps, so strikingly unlike other people's as she fancies, but with a gratifying resemblance to her own image and her own chosen abiding-place. When the thrill of invention has passed, will these continue to satisfy our Mary Olivier? Almost in the act of discovery she herself asks that question: "Supposing there isn't anything in it? Supposing—Supposing—" The truth is, at the last as at the first, we have to do not with character emerging, but with temperament coddling itself. This is a creature of hand-made ecstasies, ecstasies of discovery, of pain, of renunciation. She is the fruit of a period of spiritual decadence. We should like Miss Sinclair to tell us what the war did to her, or for her, a little later on.

MESSRS. DOUBLEDAY, PAGE have collected twelve more stories of O. Henry and twelve pieces of "Critical and Biographical Comment" into a volume that disarms criticism with the modest and pleasing title, "Waifs and Strays." The book is entirely "worth while," particularly in a world in which the "whiles" of so many people are worth so little. The stories will not increase O. Henry's reputation, but no one expects fugitive pieces to add to an author's fame; they are generous when they do not subtract. "Round the Circle" is an earlier and cruder "Pendulum," and the worth of the idea in that admirable tale is visible through the blur of an inferior treatment. The "Dog and the Playlet" is a rehearsal for the brilliant "Proof of the Pudding" in "Strictly Business." The "Proof of the Pudding" is one of those dazzlingly impossible tales in which nature plays the rhetorician, in which facts are at the same moment moulded to the symmetry of an antithesis and sharpened to the point of an epigram. In the "Dog and the Playlet" half the artifice has disappeared, taking with it more than half the interest. In several of the newer stories, the "Red Roses of Tonia," "Out of Nazareth," "Hearts and Hands," and the "Detective Detector," the demands upon the reader's faith are tantamount to a run on the bank. Next to "Round the Circle," familiar in a better version, perhaps the best of the twelve tales, is the simplest—the little story of the "Cactus," in which a lie and a love-affair are both punctured by the spines of that vindictive plant. That concision was wisdom for O. Henry is suggested by the fact that in the "Snow Man," a powerfully conceived tale of the malignity of snow, he exceeds his usual limits, and, in exceeding them, flounders and drifts.

The reminiscences of the tale-teller by personal friends like Arthur W. Page and Arthur B. Maurice, are agreeable, though the secretion of the prodigious O. Henry in the merely everyday cleverness of William Sidney Porter is a mystery which they rather deepen than dissipate. It is interesting to learn that his lodgings in

New York were all in the Irving Place and Madison Square district, and that his hatred of exercise limited his explorations to "a circle of half a mile radius, with No. 55 [Irving Place] as the centre." He lived in New York, like a weevil in an apple, restricted in his movements, but gnawing at the core. Mr. Maurice and Miss (or Mrs.?) Caroline Frances Richardson trace the particular stories to their lairs in New York or New Orleans; the relation of the tales to the spots was like that of the south wind to the violets, "stealing and giving odor." In the ten lists of ten favorite stories, the diversity is emphasized by the collector; but this diversity, though interesting, seems rather less interesting than the agreement. Nicholas Vachel Lindsay and Christopher Morley show zest and nimbleness in eulogistic verse; in O. Henry's pen Mr. Lindsay sees a sword, Mr. Morley a pestle. National vanity may observe with pleasure that the two English critiques which the volume reproduces are childish beside the American estimates, but only national folly would see in such a fact the anchorage for a generality. One may doubt, however, whether even American criticism is happy in calling O. Henry the Yankee Maupassant; Maupassant was a bandit in evening dress; O. Henry would not have stooped to his brigandage, and could not have risen to his clothes.

Not the least valuable part of the book is the comprehensive index to the numerous, various, and slippery O. Henry stories.

Post-war productions such as Mr. G. C. Logio's informing book on "Bulgaria Problems and Politics" (George H. Doran Company) seldom steer clear of the shoal of after-wisdom. "Bulgaria's intervention, which would have been immediately followed by that of Greece, would have realized better results than Italy's, for one such result would have been Turkey's definite overthrow. No Bulgarian Government could have withstood the outburst of popular feeling in favor of the Entente which a spontaneous offer of Macedonia would have provoked in Bulgaria at that propitious moment." The assurance of this statement loses much of its convincing force if it is read, as it ought to be, in the light of the author's interesting account of the people's political immaturity. According to Mr. Logio "the Bulgarian's sole preoccupation is how to earn his daily bread. To him everything else is God's or the Government's business." What outburst of popular feeling from such a constitutional indifference could have been strong enough to bend the pro-German Government to its will-less guidance?

It is easy to see how the writer has stumbled into this self-contradiction. The tenor of his book is to prove that the sins of the vicious Government of Radoslavov should not be visited on the harmless Bulgarian people who, honest earners of their daily bread as they are, never dreamt of enriching their country with the spoils that Germany promised Bulgaria as a reward for her armed intervention. But the author has yet another case to prove: that Germany's diplomatic success at Sofia was chiefly due to the disregard with which the Entente Powers treated Bulgaria's aspirations towards ethnical unity. That such ambitions are in evidence outside the limited scope of the Bulgarian intelligentsia seems hardly credible, considering the author's approval of the following sentiment which he quotes from "an elderly and highly respectable" countryman: "We Bulgarians are not yet a nation, for we are still devoid of a national consciousness. We are merely striving to become a nation, and like a flock of sheep we are being led goodness knows whither." But the intelligentsia could not, in good earnest, urge the application of the four complementary points of Mr. Wilson to Bulgaria, if its patriotism were not shared by the bulk of the nation. Hence Mr. Logio's attempt, in a subsequent chapter, to represent the people as more emancipated and consciously in sympathy with the Entente's slogan of national self-determination than he himself has given the Bulgarian nation credit for.

"Homing with the Birds," by Gene Stratton-Porter (Doubleday, Page), is a pleasant, smoothly written record of the author's life-long experience with birds, dating from the time when her father made her a gift of all the feathered creatures on the farm, and running through maturer years when she had learned to watch intelligently and to photograph skilfully. Mrs. Porter is perhaps at her best in the earlier chapters. The later ones, dealing with general subjects, are uneven, and in places her enthusiasm has outrun her facts. Her belief that hummingbirds and vireos have increased their nest-building facility and acquired additional technique and artistry in exterior decoration during the period of her own lifetime is very alluring but highly improbable. A few of the more excellent photographs would have added beauty and interest to the book, whereas the multitude of poor ones is confusing and detracts from the text.

The three sermons in the little volume, "What Peace Means" (The "Comrade Series"; Fleming H. Revell), are described by their author, Dr. Henry van Dyke, as "just daily bread discourses," fitted, as he touchingly says, for "strangers and pilgrims, in the great city and the troubled world." The three discourses are written in a quiet, even, trustful key, interrupted only by a passing rebuke to what the author calls the "silly pacifist." They re-voice the old faith, the faith in the soul, in righteousness, in immortality, in something not strikingly remote from the old terms. Such avowals grow more touching as they grow rare and the circle of their appeal diminishes. They remind some of us a little of the ineffable pathos of the last act of Stephen Phillips's "Herod," when Mariamne, dead to the court, is still alive to the heart and the hope of the unpersuadable old King. The religious spirit, after all, may not be so perishable as Mariamne. Even were its disappearance final, the fact should move us to such utterance as Wordsworth's over the extinction of the Venetian republic:

Men are we, and must grieve when even the shade
Of that which once was great is passed away.

A Spectator at the Industrial Conference

IN this fair and spacious city of Washington there dwell a number of persons whose avocation it is to attend hearings and meetings of one sort and another where the discussion is of large public importance and where prominent or distinguished or well-known public firms are on view. Through constant attendance at these proceedings they have developed a sixth sense which tells them whether the assemblage or the hearing will amount to anything or not. They are the cognoscenti. Another group, equally expert with the divining rod, and made up of the Washington correspondents, sit at the press tables.

Both of these groups, I found, during the first week of the Industrial Conference, had definitely made up their mind. They said at once: "Nothing will come of this. It is not real. These people will pow-wow here for a while, but they are not on the level with one another. In a little while it will blow up." And that, of course, is exactly what happened. In the end the Industrial Conference failed because of its inability to answer the age-old inquiry made famous by the loud outcry of the Honorable Webster Flanagan: "What are we here for?" That is what the conference could not find out, and not being able to find out, it naturally could not settle anything. The assemblage never got anywhere because it never got started; could not get under way. From the very beginning there was lacking any sense of direction. The employers group frankly acknowledged this after the conference failed, when it said:

It has been demonstrated that failure is inevitable where preliminary organization of the elements composing such a conference is absent and where no preparation is made for the orderly presentation of a programme which shall include all of the known factors upon which industrial relations are based.

But that was not the only difficulty. The groups were too sharply accentuated, and they were not well chosen as to their personnel in the first place. This was particularly true of the group that was supposed to represent the public. It was all very well for the President in choosing the personnel of the conference to take a certain number of men from labor and a certain number of men to represent employers and another certain number to represent the public, but a mistake was made when the conference organized and these three groups isolated themselves, conferring together as units, discussing the questions that were presented to them as units, and voting as units. By this course they sharply accentuated the lack of cohesion. They had no common meeting ground. They had no public discussion and presentation of their several points of view. When anything was brought up that needed to be threshed out in open debate, this was never done. Instead, each little group would scuttle away to its private meeting place, and there "caucus." Then after a length of time they would all return to the hall and solemnly vote as a group "Aye" or "No."

It was a futile performance to watch and it turned out in the end to be futile in performance. The members of the conference started out by being class-conscious. As it turned out in the end, the constituent members of the conference could scarcely have been selected with less skill. The capitalist group certainly represented the employers, and the labor group represented the unions, both in a sense private interests, and viewed as such and represented as such by the two groups. But the third group, the public group, so-called, was as private as a tooth brush. The real, unorganized public, the ultimate consumer, if you will, that great middle-class group between the capitalist on the one hand and the labor unions on the other, was not represented at all.

Moreover, the members of the conference had too much money. Taking Mr. Rockefeller and Mr. Gary and Mr. Baruch at one end and Miss Wald, Charles Edward Russell, and John Spargo at the other end, the average income of all the members of the conference must have ranged between sixty and seventy-five thousand dollars a year. It is safe to say that not a dozen persons sitting in the three groups had an income of less than $10,000 a year. I do not mean this estimate of these incomes as a criticism. I only report it.

Sitting in the Hall of the Americas day by day and watching the conference, I could not perceive that it was affected with the public interest. At times it seemed to me for all the world like two enemy squads in fortified shell-holes, sniping at one another, while the so-called public group dodged about between or lay flat upon the ground while the shooting was going on. The labor men knew what they wanted, in definite terms, and were resolved to get it or leave the conference. In the end they did not get it and did leave the conference. The employers group, too, knew precisely what they wanted. The public group was simply whip-sawed between the two.

What was to my mind one of the most significant incidents of the whole conference never got into the newspapers. It was a speech made by Fuller Callaway, of La Grange, Georgia, one of the public group. His speech was lost in the flood of resolutions that the newspapers were obliged to print but it disclosed more clearly than anything else that was said in any of the open sessions the gulf that was never bridged between the capitalist group and the labor group. Mr. Callaway is a capitalist of a rather unusual sort. He is at the head of a group of cotton mills at La Grange where about 7,000 operatives are employed. He believes in a closed shop; that is, closed against union labor. He has never allowed his people to be unionized. He has never had any labor difficulties or any strikes. One afternoon he was called upon to tell the story of his mills and how he avoided strikes and labor troubles. His recital was marked by shrewdness and common sense and humor. He began by saying: "I am here to represent the public—not capital and not labor; and I want to say that probably between 50 and 75 per cent. of the population of America consists of individuals who are not standardized and who do not want to be standardized by either capital or labor. They are the great mass of people that are the backbone of this country. In making our rules and regulations here we must not leave them out, because if we do they have a way of rising without any notice and righting themselves and righting you and righting the country."

Mr. Callaway twice used the cow by way of illustration. He seemed very much impressed by the fact that she could be milked. He told about what they did at La Grange to educate their mill operatives. "I took the position that an educated man was like a cow. When I buy cows I get good, blooded stock, because they do not eat any more than scrubs. I give them a nice house, curry them, and then rub them on the nose before milking, and they give four gallons of cream. And a cow is better for giving four gallons than letting her go in somebody's mullein patch, getting full of ticks, and only giving a pint of milk."

Mr. Callaway was tolerant and kindly and paternal, but he rasped the nerves of the labor group. They heard him with impatience and when he sat down Mr. Gompers almost snorted: "Mr. Chairman, now may we go on with the business of this conference?"

Neither the capital nor the labor group ever once assumed the demeanor of negotiators. From the beginning they bore themselves as opposing hostile elements with nothing in common, but with deep fundamental differences to be fought out to a finish. It was the attitude of war. The two groups took it for granted, seemingly, that a clash could not be avoided, and they came to the conference as to an arena where after a trial of strength the "winner" could be named victor. They were both "bitter enders." Neither of them proposed a peace without victory. It was a discouraging spectacle. They each sought advantage and a master hold.

Since the conference broke up various epitaphs have been pronounced by the participants in confirmation of the impressions of an attentive spectator, as I have set them forth here. Franklin K. Lane, chairman of the conference, said: "The Industrial Conference never really got started. . . . We will suffer for this spasm of hysterical self-assertiveness on all sides." Mr. H. B. Endicott of the public group has said that the make-up of the groups of the conference precluded the possibility of accomplishing anything constructive. Judge Gary has also criticised the make-up of the Conference. He has said that in the employers group there were several "some of whom, at least, should have been in the labor group." He has also pointed out that in the public group there was no representation of hundreds of vocations, professions, or merchants "all of whom are more or less affected by the cost of production, the expenses of living, and, therefore, the control and conditions of both capital and labor." Mr. Gary also objected that unorganized labor was not represented in the labor group; that is, about 85 per cent. of the workingmen in this country were, he said, not represented at all.

A SPECTATOR

Montemezzi and His Music

VERDI has gone, and Boito, and Leoncavallo. Puccini nods at times. Mascagni has spent himself. But there are still a few to take their places in sunny Italy. And chiefly two—Zandonai and Montemezzi.

The youngest of them all is Montemezzi, the beguiling young composer of a three-act work familiar to frequenters of the Metropolitan. "L'Amore dei Tre Re"—a gracious opera; flowing, melodic, marked by charm and style; with not a little power at several points; dramatic to a fault in certain episodes. The work, no doubt, owed much of its appeal to the tragedy of that strange, cynical Sem Benelli which fired the composer—the Sem Benelli of the later "La Cena delle Beffe" (Englished as "The Jest") which has for months spelt fortune to the Plymouth Theatre.

Who is this Montemezzi? What has he done—before the appearance of his "L'Amore dei Tre Re" assured his fame here? Till then he had been little but a name to most of us, though in Europe he had been better known. Is he a promise that will be fulfilled? Or will he, like Mascagni, leave only one work with a touch of genius as his legacy to music?

Well, in the nick of time, he has crossed the seas, the bearer of a new and ambitious opera which will soon be sung. His latest work, "La Nave," is to be given at the Chicago Opera House, where Montemezzi is now busily rehearsing. Great hopes have been aroused by the announcement of this effort. D'Annunzio has lent it the prestige of his fantastic inspiration.

The libretto of "La Nave" is a condensed form of the play by that poet, arranged to suit the opera boards by Tito Ricordi, who is the composer's publisher. So far, despite his undisputed genius, d'Annunzio has not yet made a particularly good librettist. His "Francesca" had the makings of an opera in it, but was marred by the unpractical and tedious castle scene. "La Nave," we are told, has safer stuff in it, well suited to the purposes of a musician. A month or two from now we shall know more. And so will the composer of the opera.

And even should that work not prove all we hope of it, we shall still have the "Tre Re" to win our hearts. At thirty-seven—the age of Montemezzi—all things are possible.

On his way West, this recent distinguished visitor of ours spent two days in New York. He made the most of his brief stay, saw many interviewers, lunched at the Ritz, supped at the Biltmore, and revelled in the Hippodrome.

There was no opera house for him to go to; and Mr. Hopkins, I daresay, did not encourage him to compare the American "Jest" with the original "Cena." (Both are excellent, of course. But—they are different). Introspective, dreamy, full of his own thoughts, he has a disconcerting way of lapsing suddenly into forgetfulness of even his near friends. Galeffi, the Chicago baritone who arrived with him, stood at his elbow for five minutes while we talked, trying to take leave of him. But all his "Caro maestros" and "A rivedercis" for a time fell on deaf ears. He was too rapt in what he was saying of d'Annunzio just then to care for other things.

His eyes, brown-yellow, seemed the homes of dreams. His tall, slight form, crowned by a poetic head, bespoke a man ill-fitted for real, modern life. His sensitive mouth, his aquiline nose, and delicate features, confirmed this view of him. The sweep of his already greying hair above his forehead completed the impression. By comparison Puccini, with his bluff bonhomie, the late Leoncavallo, with his paunch and his wee legs, Zandonai, who is hard and gaunt of face, and Mascagni, who is worn and wan with nervousness, might have seemed commonplace. I could not say that he suggested greatness. The adjective that perhaps describes him best is the Italian "simpatico."

That word would also best describe the music that we know of his. It is not modern, in the same sense as Debussy's or d'Indy's or Stravinsky's. It is the antithesis of what some love in the music of the astounding Richard Strauss. It links one safely with the style of Richard Wagner, but without plagiarism. It lacks the grandeur and the power of that composer. Montemezzi (to appraise him by his "Tre Re" and only that) has a flow of melody; he observes the melodic line, but his invention is limited. One need not look to him for harmonic audacities and great climaxes. Yet he delights one by his charm and his musicianship. He has sentiment and grace and much besides—a breadth and expressive gift which greater men might envy. There is no mystery in his art to baffle one, no subtleties like those one finds in the "Pelléas" of Debussy and (in another way) in the "Conchita" of Zandonai. His music is quite honest and direct. It stirs one pleasantly.

I was not aware, till Montemezzi enlightened me, that he had five operas to his credit, to say nothing of a cantata which he wrote eight years ago in honor of Ponchielli.

"My first attempt," said the composer, "was an historic opera, 'Giovanni Galurese,' which had much success in Italy. It was founded on the tale of a Sardinian hero who fought against the Spanish domination. My second work was sentimental and romantic in character. I named it 'Hellera.' Besides these, I have composed a one-act opera, 'Bianca,' a setting of a libretto written in a dialect; my 'L'Amore dei Tre Re,' of which I need say nothing, and 'La Nave.'

"I studied under Ferroni and Saladini at the Milan Conservatory. My people were not rich, by any means, and my father, who was then engaged in industrial pursuits, did not quite relish the idea of my trusting to music for a livelihood. But—well, he waived the point. He himself had been a bit of a musician; for, when Austria was the ruling Power in the Veneto, he had been a musician in a regimental band. As for myself, I am not an instrumentalist—except as to the piano. Most that I know of orchestration, apart from my studies, I have learned by listening to the instruments from the gallery of the Scala."

Montemezzi would not acknowledge his indebtedness to any other composer. From friends of his I hear, though, that in his "Giovanni Galurese" he was much influenced, like most men of his day, by Richard Wagner. For the modern Russians he professes a great liking, and he speaks admiringly of his forerunner, Catalani. He composes, as he assured me, rather slowly. But less slowly than Puccini, who is lazy and too fond at times of duck-shooting.

"Most of my time," said he, "is lost in looking for librettos."

And then he launched into a lament about the dearth of good librettists nowadays, the difficulty of unearthing a fit theme, the hardships of adapting one's libretto, when at last it has been discovered, to the composer's moods.

"It took me quite two years to find 'La Nave!'" he explained. "To be sure, Puccini lost four years in finding a subject to succeed his 'La Fanciulla.'

"In Italy to-day we have Adami and Forzano. Illica, who once did so much good work, is out of the running, more or less."

Puccini had often talked to me in the same strain. In the interval between his "Fanciulla" ("The Girl of the Golden West") and his late triplet of operas, he had toyed with the "Two Little Wooden Shoes" of Ouida (since made into an opera as "Lodoletta" by Mascagni) and meditated over "Hannele."

"Ah, 'Hannele!'" once said Puccini to me in Paris, "I'd love to compose it. But—I don't know whether it would suit my public."

Perhaps it is just as well that the composer of "La Bohème" and "Tosca" did not touch "Hannele," which of all modern plays is the most mystical and exquisite.

For ten minutes Montemezzi harped and harped on this matter of librettos. And I could not keep from smiling to myself as I thought how lightly most Americans regard the unhappy serfs who inspire great music. Few seem to realize that, lacking librettos of the right kind of invention, there could be no operas. But librettists are ignored by hosts of opera-goers, who seem to treat them as the most negligible quantities. They are really the foundations of lyric drama. The inventors of books for comic operas and musical comedies grow fat and rich. The men to whom we owe "Carmens" and "Aidas" get small thanks.

How rare they are we now know from Montemezzi. Can we wonder that Richard Wagner wrote his own poems, and that Charpentier and Dukas have followed his example?

New Plays by Bernard Shaw

HEARTBREAK HOUSE, GREAT CATHERINE, AND PLAYLETS OF THE WAR. By Bernard Shaw. New York: Brentano's.

M R. SHAW'S latest volume contains one full-length play, "Heartbreak House," and five shorter plays, of which one only, the "Great Catherine," is unconnected with the recent war. The things of value in these minor plays are the recruiting sketch, "O'Flaherty V. C.," and the first two of the four scenes of the "Great Catherine." "O'Flaherty," among other anomalies, sets forth a debate in which an impossibly brilliant rustic wins a shamelessly easy victory over an impossibly stupid general, but it rises to value through its racy reflex of the pungencies and lusthoods of Irish peasant life. The first two scenes of the "Great Catherine" are redolent of a glorious madness, a drunken splendor, which sweeps the reader with it in its rush; in the last two scenes the drama, like other inebriates, falls down stairs, marking each tread by a bump and an outcry, and dropping at last in a formless heap on the mat at the stair-foot. Of the other short plays, "Augustus Does His Bit" and "Annajanska, the Bolshevik Empress" are jocularities of a mirthless type. The "Inca of Perusalem" is brightly introduced, but the German Emperor whom it dissembles under its fantastic title is a creature at whom we rather yawn than gape.

"Heartbreak House" is the record of six hours in the lives of nine English folk, herding together in a curious mixture of form and informality like fashionable castaways on a desert island. The bustling idleness and vehement but at bottom good-natured antagonism in which they live results in a bewildering abundance of emplacements, displacements, and replacements, of contacts, clashes, and recoils. The astute manager, anxious for happenings, might sadly note that the net result of all this ado is simply this: the tightening in the second act, and the dissolution in the third, of an engagement which even in Act I was not so much a knot as a loop. He might solace himself by the perception that there is plenty of very headlong, very extreme, and very abortive flirtation, and that a final explosion from German aircraft, to which nothing in the movement of the play has contributed, disposes of two rogues and leaves their associates vibrating in a condition between ecstasy and panic.

The title and vague chart of this play might possibly be a reminiscence of Peacock, in whose "Nightmare Abbey" and "Crotchet Castle" odd fishes of grotesque and varied scale swim around and over each other in a costly aquarium on a drawing-room centre-table. More serious, however, is the acknowledged debt to Chekhov. Chekhov's best-known dramas are all, according to Mr. Shaw, pictures of Heartbreak House, which represents "cultured leisured Europe before the war." The mixture of stoicism and frenzy of lethargy and hysteria in Chekhov's extraordinary work is only latent or nascent in Mr. Shaw's thoroughly contemptuous, but far from ill-natured, exhibition of this class. They are persons of radical brain and conservative muscles, persons who, practically futile, console themselves by letters, art, and sex for the ruin into which their futility is plunging both their country and themselves.

Of the traits which Mr. Shaw intended to signalize in "Heartbreak House," culture, leisure, æsthetic distractions, flirtation, inefficiency, how many has he actually brought out? The flirtation he has unmistakably drawn, and the inefficiency, if not depicted, is at all events explicitly declared. But the culture is hardly evident; the leisure is the reverse of evident, and the æsthetic bias reveals itself only in a quarter of an hour's enforced perusal of a volume of the Temple Shakespeare by an impatient and preoccupied young woman. Even the neighborhood of luxury and peril, which might have given to Mr. Shaw's England the impressiveness of a Lusitania before the shock, is not conveyed by the homeliness and disorder of the household he has pictured.

"Heartbreak House" confirms the impression which Mr. Shaw's plays, especially his later plays, induce and accentuate in the critic's mind. Mr. Shaw is a realist and a dramatist, but he is not a realistic dramatist; he is a realistic thinker and a fantastic dramatist. Mr. Shaw is not unaware of this; he calls the first play in this volume a fantasia and the last a bravura. Throughout, a curious romantic masquerade of impersonations, recognitions, and surprises is employed in the service of a propaganda whose aim is the removal of masks from the face of actuality. So far nothing is wrong; and if Mr. Shaw had been content to couch a purely realistic message in a purely fantastic vehicle, he could have pointed to Aristophanes's "Peace" and the "Birds" and to Molière's "George Dandin" as forerunners and supporters of his work. But this was too simple for Mr. Shaw. He wanted not only fantasy but talk, unlimited talk, talk which should turn "Getting Married" and "Misalliance" and "Heartbreak House" into parliaments, and he wanted to give his talkers the clothes and ways of a society the mere rigging or harness of which was to be unflinchingly contemporaneous.

Mr. Shaw, then, holding to his realistic substance, has been led to express that substance in a mixed form—a form that was at once realistic and partially, fitfully, and unevenly symbolical. This was the beginning of evil. It is proper to say that righteousness and peace have kissed each other, or that Hamlet took Horatio by the hand. But to say that righteousness kissed Hamlet, or that Horatio took peace by the hand is to ignore and to insult propriety. The present play is an admirably clear illustration of this error. Many of the portraits are real, or, at least, are sincere endeavors at reality. There are, for instance, the guardsman, Hector Hushabye, whose destructive weapon is his moustaches; the diplomatist, Randall Utterword, whom the coquetries of the Foreign Office have not instructed in the politics of love; and the pulling and crawling promoter Mangan, whose folly is viewed as the indispensable link between the brains of the inventor and the brains of the workingman. But much else is plainly or probably symbolic. The house—shaped like a ship—is England; the meals at all hours are England's shifting and make-shift statesmanship; the old captain is the tenacious but receding British manliness; the burglar, whose business is to get caught as a prelude to getting cosseted, may stand for modern tenderness toward criminals; the final explosion, ostensibly Germanic, is abstrusely socialistic or revolutionary. The fault lies neither with the symbolism nor with the realism as such, but with the mixture, and the uncertainty in the composition of the mixture. Bunyan's allegories and La Fontaine's fables have a relation to truth which is distant indeed, but uniform and precise, and you can reach truth through La Fontaine and Bunyan, just as you can tell the right time by a watch that is three hours slow, if you know that it is three hours slow and that it neither gains nor loses time. Mr. Shaw's watch is useless, because it varies; it not only needs setting, it needs regulation.

Mr. Shaw has built up a world in which nothing is in place nor out of place, and he has reached a point where he is capable of the unhesitating and tranquil commission of acts which in another dramatist would be lunacies or crimes. For example, there is in "Heartbreak House" a young lady called Ellie Dunn who at six o'clock is all tender innocence, at eight o'clock all cynical greed, at ten o'clock all freakish attachment, and at twelve o'clock all heroic generosity. Another consequence of this novel world is the obliteration, not of the faculty of humor, but of the conditions which made that faculty a challenge and a joy. Comedy grows largely out of the collision between nature (or fact and convention), and Shaw, in disowning convention and remodeling nature, has pretty near abolished comedy. The abnormal owes its power to the norm. Lilliput and Brobdingnag derive all their point from Gulliver. The Dickens world is in its basis rational and orderly; therefore when the reader comes upon a queer point in the Dickens world, he says "Why?" and laughs; when, in these later times at least, he comes to a queer point in the Shaw world, he says "Why not?" and doesn't laugh.

I have not spared Mr. Shaw's later dramatic work in the above review; it is now both a duty and a pleasure to say that "Heartbreak House" is to me the most agreeable long play that has emanated from Mr. Shaw since the "Doctor's Dilemma." Our friend, in his chronic endeavor to ring the tocsin, has often the effect of beating a gong. The gong is audible—painfully audible—in "Heartbreak House," but the appeasements, the softenings, are multiplied. There is the quivering title. There is the setting, the quaint ship-like room, and the dimness of the tranquil garden. There is the white-bearded, not unlovable old captain, who keeps a place for young girls between the rum and the dynamite in the hold of his invincible old heart. There is even here and there (see page 110) a kind of spirituality, a glowworm spirituality, the more touching that we scarcely trust its gleam. Last of all, there is the awe that darkles through the farce, as the farce twinkles through the awe in the strange mixture of horror and transport that conducts the drama to its unexampled close.

Books and the News

[Under this heading are presented, from week to week, articles mentioning a few books which should be useful to the reader who wishes to go a little further into matters of current interest than the newspapers and periodicals will take him. Attempt is made to keep the articles practical by naming only books which ought to be available, without much trouble through publisher, book-shop, or public library. Books obscure or out of print are avoided, and books in English are preferred to those in other languages. These articles are in no sense bibliographies for the specialist, aiming at completeness, and including magazine or newspaper articles, but merely brief, impartial, selected lists of books, new and old, which may help to make the news of the week more intelligible. The articles are written by the Editor of Publications of the New York Public Library.]

Ireland

IN the section about the Earl of Essex, in Sir George Younghusband's recent book on the Tower of London, the author says that Essex was sent to Ireland, in 1599, with instructions to reduce the rebels. "That was more than three hundred years ago, and yet might have been written in a very recent year of grace." Ireland's resistance to England has practically never ceased, yet few readers who wish to study the present situation will care to go far back into Irish history. For those who do so care, there is P. W. Joyce's "A Short History of Ireland; from the Earliest Times to 1608" (Longman, 1893). Better still, for an interesting sketch of the past, from legendary days to those of Parnell, you may read in an hour or two Justin McCarthy's "Ireland and Her Story" (Marshall, 1903).

Now, for the present day. Here are the writers who sympathize, moderately or fervently, with the Sinn Fein. Francis Hackett's "Ireland; a Study of Nationalism" (Huebsch, 1918), is characterized as moderate, and is an account of contemporary and recent conditions. P. S. O'Hegarty, author of "Sinn Fein; an Illumination" (Maunsel, 1919), is a fervent advocate; his work is very brief. A longer book, also ardent, is Francis P. Jones's "History of the Sinn Fein Movement and the Irish Rebellion of 1916" (Kenedy, 1917). George Creel's "Ireland's Fight for Freedom" (Harper, 1919), is, according to the New York Times, a vehement attack upon England, reciting all the ill she has done, and omitting to mention any of the good. Warre B. Wells and N. Marlowe have written two books, "A History of the Irish Rebellion of 1916" (Maunsel, 1916) and "The Irish Convention and Sinn Fein" (Stokes, 1919). American readers should not miss Shane Leslie's "The Irish Issue in its American Aspect" (Scribner, 1917), a "brilliant discussion by a moderate Sinn Feiner."

For the other side, a book written from the British and Unionist point of view is Philip G. Cambray's "Irish Affairs and the Home Rule Question" (Murray, 1911). Ian Hay's "The Oppressed English" (Doubleday, 1917) is an amusing skit, with much good sense in so far as it applies to the English. Whether its opinions on the Irish question are good or bad sense opens the whole question in dispute. As with many other books written from its point of view, the copy I examined had been briefly annotated by an Irish patriot: "Another damned English lie."

An American, the professor of European history in the University of Michigan, has tried to write an impartial study of the whole question. This is Edward R. Turner, whose "Ireland and England in the Past and at Present" (Century, 1919) is your one book, if you can read but one. He truly says that in America the question is usually discussed by extremists and, of course, extremists will not like his book. It discusses ancient Ireland, Home Rule, and recent events, and gives references to further reading.

A literary woman's comments upon Irish life and letters during recent years is Katherine Tynan's "The Years of the Shadow" (Houghton, 1919). And if you wish to drop politics, and read of the land and the people, you have a fascinating choice between Birmingham's jolly novels, Somerville and Ross's tales, and James Stephen's poetical romances.

"THE peace of the whole world can never again be broken, and international wrong on a vast scale can never again occur, while England and America stand together as the bulwark of freedom and democracy." This sentence from Mr. Marling's address of welcome to the Prince of Wales, on the occasion of his visit to the New York Chamber of Commerce, expresses a sentiment which, throughout the time that Yanks and Tommies were fighting shoulder to shoulder, was uppermost in the minds of Americans and British alike. In the weeks following the great victory in which they had been joint partakers, the sentiment became, if anything, stronger than ever, and found utterance in a thousand stirring forms. If it now seems to have been dimmed, or to have been thrust into the background, by some of the untoward developments of our domestic wrangle over the peace treaty, that is all the more reason why Americans who have a sense for what is of abiding worth and of vital import should take every opportunity to reassert it, and to restore it to that place in the public mind which rightfully belongs to it. For nothing is more certain than that the welfare of both countries, and of all the world, is inseparably bound up with the maintenance of genuine friendship and good will between England and America.

THE journey of the Prince of Wales across the ocean would be quite justified if he had come to tell us no more than is said in one sentence of his address of thanks to the American people for the welcome which he has doubtless by this time found to be genuine. "Your aims," he said, "are as democratic as ours." The easy—and justified—assumption, coupled with the sense of gratifying discovery, is worth tons of "propaganda." Politically, a fair case could be made out in support of the view that England is more democratic than America. The quick responsiveness of government to the will of the people, the speed and certitude with which that will can be discovered, the easy access for men of ability to a political career in which they find themselves unhampered by considerations of the locality in which they happen to reside, must seem even to an unprejudiced mind vastly more flexible and democratic than our own more cumbersome methods of executing the popular will. Theoretically, it is undoubtedly more democratic; practically, in a time of stress like that through which the world is passing, there is probably not a great deal to choose between the two. In no respect is the British system more democratic than in the fact that it gladly maintains a royal family to furnish an element of permanence and continuity, with a view to keeping every thing else as delicately answerable to the public will as possible.

IN the social relations the theoretical advantages lie all with us, and in practice, too, if we consider England only as it was at the close of the Victorian era. But even here it may be remarked that there is no social tyranny so relentless as one that is not quite sure of itself, none quite so harsh as one that is not entirely satisfied with itself. Coming down to the individual, the Englishman, certainly, is less tolerant of abuses, little and big, than the American; he is more ready to try to get something done about it, with a firmer conviction that something, somehow, will be done. The English would not put up with the municipal tyrannies that many Americans lie under with only an occasional wriggle of protest; and so on down to those minima of life with which the law does not concern itself.

IN truth, however, the two democracies are conceived on quite different plans. The British, a small and singularly homogeneous people reaching out from a genuinely national capital through the whole world; ours, sprawlingly continental, sending ambassadors from a thousand localities to a sort of neutral trysting place. The Englishman suffers from the fact that he is generally disinclined to be anything but insular; we, when we desire to be something more than parochial, from a tendency to vague diffuseness. The English have long been known to be mad. An observer among us to-day, noting us at the game of fast-and-loose with the destinies of the world while we discover British plots to annex the State of Maine, might well wonder whether we had not got more than our share of the common heritage. But the Prince very tactfully put it, not that we were each equally democratic in precisely the same way, but that each as ardently as the other desired to be democratic—"Your aims are as democratic as ours." And this is a compliment that carries gifts in either hand.

THE New Republic is devoting to the laudable enterprise of making known the truth about America the same kind of energy which it has so long manifested in relation to Russia. In the latter case, it has been possible for the "kept organs of capitalism" to plead distance and difficulty as an excuse for their falsehoods; but no such excuse is available as regards the state of things here at home. What that is, the New Republic makes absolutely plain in these carefully weighed words:

In substance the press, the politicians and the employing class are now saying to labor, "We forbid you to challenge the existing distribution of economic power in this country. We will not discuss as an open question whether that power, as it is now exercised and distributed, makes for productive efficiency, establishes a high and general standard of living or supplies the wage-earners with any sufficient motive to be actively interested in their work and loyal to their employment. . . . It will not be for you to decide whether or not you want to work or on what terms you prefer to work. You must work on the terms which the state in combination with your employers decides to be just."

The New Republic, however, has an uphill task before it. For while every open-minded person—in other words every thoroughly illuminated enemy of "capitalism"—must recognize the accuracy of the New Republic's characterization of the attitude of "the press, the politicians and the employing class," the tactics adopted by this sinister agglomeration are such as to deceive all but the very elect. Take the report, for example, just issued by the Industrial Committee of the Merchants' Association of New York. It is shot through with the spirit of progress and liberalism. It places the blame for unsatisfactory conditions quite as much upon employers as upon employees. Not a syllable is to be found in it which indicates hostility, or even unfriendliness, to labor unions. It proposes "the limitation of the economic law of supply and demand as a basis of labor policy by the utilization of a more human doctrine." It declares for "the establishment of a recognized and permanent method of conference between the employer and his employees," and under "his head it says:

The mere willingness of an employer to meet employees who have grievances is not sufficient. There should be a definite arrangement—satisfactory to both employers and employees—whereby employees can collectively take up disputes or matters of common interest with employers.

And, as everybody knows, this is but one example out of a thousand in which a similar spirit is being shown. We are not citing them, however, by way of showing that the New Republic is wrong; its complete mastery of the facts about Bolshevik Russia precludes the possibility of its being wrong in relation to what is going on right here at home. But we do confess some curiosity as to the precise way in which the New Republic reconciles the multitude of apparent manifestations of a liberal and progressive spirit in "the press, the politicians and the employing class" with its representation of them as a capitalist despotism inflexibly arrayed against the claims of labor.

NO keener personal satisfaction can come to a man in high public station than that which Carter Glass is entitled to take upon the occasion of his relinquishment of the Treasury portfolio to accept a seat in the United States Senate. When, in the case of one high office exchanged for another, the only doubt in the public mind is as to whether the loss to the old office is counterbalanced by the gain to the new, the tribute to a man's character and ability is as complete as can well be imagined. We have often only too much reason to fear that public office in our country is made unattractive to men of excellence not only by its inherent difficulties and drawbacks, but also by failure of the public adequately to appreciate high qualities and great services. Mr. Glass furnishes at least one example of the rise of a man into a position of unchallenged respect and honor throughout the nation by the sheer merit of his abilities and services.

THE disaster which has overtaken the Siberian army, now driven back on Omsk and perhaps on the point of retreating still further eastward, will greatly rejoice Bolshevik sympathizers in America, who see in it the extension of the autocracy that sits in Moscow and the triumph of their own propaganda here in America. Prompt aid on the part of America to the patriotic and constructive forces struggling against Bolshevism in Russia might have saved millions of lives and heavy cost to civilization. Without such aid, Kolchak faced insuperable difficulties, in attempting to stem the tide without supplies and with forces drawn from the scanty population of the enormous territory of Siberia. Partly owing to the localism of the Siberians, and partly to the arbitrary conduct of many of his subordinates, Kolchak steadily lost hold on the population, and his liberal and middle-of-the-road policy failed to gain the strong support of either right or left.

The center of gravity now shifts to South Russia. The outlook for Denikin, deprived of British support and in the absence of our own, is not over bright, although the territory occupied by him contains the bulk of Russia's natural resources, which are now open for development. His success or non-success will depend on the degree of economic well-being brought to the liberated population. The Bolshevik power, however, is not in itself strengthened. It is entirely probable that some sort of internal revolution will take place at Moscow, for the few thousand leaders who alone remain Bolsheviks are not likely long to continue to hold the power which they exercise by terror and by which they are unable to provide for the needs of the people. Thousands upon thousands of Russians are in the Bolshevik service, first because they are obliged to do so in order to save their lives, and secondly, because they feel that they are helping to build an organization that will maintain Russia when the gang of criminals at Moscow has been overthrown. It would not be surprising if, when this takes place, Denikin's forces and the former Soviet armies should unite under Russian leadership, actuated alike by the desire to repel all foreigners and to reunite Russia, parcelled out by the Paris Conference. Of internal struggles for power there may be many, and the country may, for a considerable period, be the scene of lawlessness and disorder, the natural result of the general demoralization brought about by Soviet rule. Some strong man will rise to the top and rule. All talk of constituent assemblies and popular elections under such conditions will be futile. Russia may indeed face strong reaction, and if so we, who failed to give timely aid and thereby win the right to assist in directing the new Russia along the paths of liberalism and democracy, will bear the heaviest share of responsibility.

WE referred last week to the articles appearing in the New York "Globe" from the pen of its correspondent, Isaac Don Levine. These articles bear the unmistakable stamp of Bolshevik inspiration, and the fact that they contain occasional criticisms of Bolshevik rule does not change their general tenor. They are widely quoted by the radical press in America as authority for commendatory comment on the Bolshevik régime and the situation it has created in Russia.

The unreliable character of Mr. Levine's correspondence is pointedly exemplified in two recent communications. On November 2nd, he cables from Berlin as follows:

Rumors circulated abroad about the terror in Russia are vicious lies.

He cables from Copenhagen on November 10th an account of an interview with Chertkov, whom he visited in Moscow, in which the latter says:

It is impossible to work, because I receive so many appeals every day for help from friends or persons arrested or condemned to death. . . . Never before have there been so many wholesale arrests and prosecutions. Never before has human life been so cheap.

Further comment on the terror by which the Bolsheviks maintain their rule would seem to be superfluous.

THE returns of the French elections so far, seem to record a crushing blow to the organized Socialists, who, by their tampering with Bolshevism, have invited defeat. The red terror conjured up by them drove the moderate parties into each other's arms. The "Bloc National" thus formed is an anti-Bolshevist alliance, consisting of heterogeneous elements held together by no other cement than this negative formula. But the immediate danger is the first that must be dealt with, and the absorption of domestic politics in this one issue of international scope was the surest way to deal with it effectively. Where laws and institutions are in jeopardy, the nation's first duty is to defend them. It would be madness for brothers to be quarreling over the cost of repairs while incendiaries were engaged in laying their house in ashes.

SINCE the issue is thus clear-cut between Bolsheviks and loyal Frenchmen, the victory of the latter implies the nation's approval of the Government of Clémenceau and his energetic conduct of the war. For within the ranks of the organized Socialists will be enlisted all those sinister elements which, all through the war, were sapping the strength of France by the spread of defeatism and the agitation for an untimely peace. The election of Léon Daudet, the merciless denouncer of Bolo Pasha and Caillaux, and the defeat, in the Department of Sarthe, of the latter's supporters, may be taken as symptoms of the people's verdict. The Bolshevik Longuet has also failed to win a seat in the new Chamber, a result which gains in significance by the fact that under the new electoral system provision has been made for minority representation. That even the leader of the revolutionaries in the section where his adherence was reckoned to be strongest could not score a victory under such circumstances does honor to the common sense and the patriotism of the electorate. The Communists, having sown the wind which was to blast the fruits of victory, are reaping the whirlwind that sweeps themselves off their feet. We congratulate M. Clémenceau on this crowning success of his great and glorious career.

WITH the legislative elections, France has entered on a period of intense political activity to culminate in the nomination of the President by the Parliament which must assemble, at the latest, on February 3 of next year. The precedence given to the legislative elections, which the Commission on Universal Suffrage had proposed to be held the very last, was fixed upon by a vote of the Chamber of Deputies after M. Clémenceau, in defending it, had put the question of confidence. Their meaning and importance would doubtless have been lessened and obscured if repeated elections, municipal, departmental, and Senatorial, had dulled the people's zest for the chief contest.

IN Italy the results, so far, are much less disappointing to the Socialists, although they reckoned to seat 120 candidates, trusting to the dissension within the other parties. The pivot on which the elections turned was not a question of the future but of the past. The war has been an emotion too tremendous to be discarded as a business finished and done with. Passions are still aflame, and this was an opportunity for the citizens, long subdued into silence by military discipline and censorship, to pass sentence on the men who are responsible for the war and its conduct. This issue, far removed from politics, has been the cause of schisms within the parties and of alliances between opposing factions. The Liberals especially are hopelessly divided into supporters and antagonists of the Government. This dissension was to bring grist to the mill of the Socialists whose doctrinairism makes them immune from the dissolving effects of the war issue.

The incomplete returns show a result not much different from these pessimistic forecasts. The Socialists have secured a hundred of the 120 seats they had counted on, and the only party that can cope with theirs in numbers is the party of the Catholics. We shall soon learn whether the latter, with the support of the liberal groups, will be strong enough to oppose both the radicalism of the extreme left and the dangerous chauvinism of the militarists who have their poetic champion in d'Annunzio.

THE returns in the General Election in Belgium show a Socialist gain at the cost of the Catholics and the Liberal party. For many reasons this outcome had been expected. The Roman Catholic party has been in power for the last thirty-five years, and this undisputed control has left the party machine unfit for a contest under greatly altered circumstances. Plural voting has been abolished, and the system of proportional representation brought into operation on a more extensive scale, both measures that could bring no advantage to Liberals and Catholics. And as the present coalition Government consists of members of the three leading parties, the elections cannot be manipulated by the Cabinet. Three of the Ministers in the Cabinet, Hymans, Renkin and Vandervelde, opposed one another in the same "arrondissement," Hymans being the candidate of the Liberals, Renkin of the Catholics, and Vandervelde of the Socialists. Another circumstance which proved fatal to the Catholics is a split in the party caused by differences of opinion between its leaders as to their attitude towards the Flemish movement. Minister of State Van de Vijvere and M. Pouillet, President of the Chamber, two prominent Roman Catholics, have declared themselves for concessions to the demands of the Flamings, greatly to the indignation of the Walloon Catholics. The "Schism of Malines" has been much discussed of late in Belgium, and has caused no little satisfaction to the Socialists. The Liberal party, however, needed not fear any decomposition through the agency of the Flemish question. Liberals in Belgium are anti-Flemish, and Flemings are either Catholics or Socialists.

THE assassin whose shot has proved fatal to Hugo Haase injured his victim more by the timing of his attack than by the shot itself. A good man's memory may suffer from his passing away at a moment of decline in reputation. If Haase had died four years ago, his fame would have gained a lasting quality by a well-timed exit from the stage. In those days his manly stand against the half-hearted tactics of Scheidemann and his group, and his defiance of the Government, won him esteem both in the Allied and in neutral countries. The fall of that Government proved an injury to Haase's name abroad, as it left him without an opportunity of shining out as the leader of a hopeless fight against autocracy. In strict adherence to the tenets of Marxism he now levelled his attacks against the Majority Socialists in the new Government who abandoned those tenets for a compromise with the bourgeois parties. His prestige in non-German countries suffered in the same degree in which the present Government was deemed superior to those of von Bethmann-Hollweg and his Imperial successors, and when he did not withhold his party's moral support from the Spartans, though refusing to join them in practice, he became an object of suspicion where before he had commanded admiration. The doctrine to which he adhered with praiseworthy consistency made his political career one of everlasting opposition. He never got a chance to manifest the possession of those constructive talents by which we gauge a statesman's real worth.

DISPACHES from Mexico City tell of the reopening of El Toreo, the famous bull ring, closed by President Carranza three years ago. There is the modification, however, that the matadors have no permission to kill the bulls. Inasmuch as the bulls have never been supposed to have permission to kill the matadors, the new arrangement may perhaps be construed not as a renewed authorization of cruelty to animals, but as a step forward in the abolition of class privilege in Mexico. Put on terms of equality, the bull, a "scraper" by instinct, may possibly enjoy the restored festivities quite as heartily as the matador. An attendance of 17,000 at the first exhibition indicates that a bloody finale is not necessary to the popularity of the sport.

Life or Death for the Treaty?

AS this paper goes to press, the peace treaty is approaching the crisis which will decide its fate. How that crisis will be met by the Democratic Senators, under the lead of Senator Hitchcock, cannot be known until the President's sealed letter, now in his hands, shall be opened, and read to them in conference. How it will be met by Senator Lodge and his followers is equally uncertain. One thing only is clear, but upon that one thing a substantial hope can be founded. The moderate reservationists on the Republican side of the Senate are still, as they have been all along, sincere and earnest in their desire to save the treaty; and they still have it in their power to save it.

In saying this, we are assuming that no compromise will be reached at once, of a character to insure immediate ratification of the treaty by a two-thirds vote of the Senate. The chance of this is so slight that no one seems to entertain it as a practical possibility. It is looked upon as certain that the ratification resolution, containing all the Lodge reservations that have not been rejected, will come immediately to a vote, and that it will fail to receive the necessary two-thirds majority.

On the face of things the treaty will then be dead. But to permit an end so sudden and so blind to come to all the struggle of a twelvemonth for a decent conclusion upon an issue so unspeakably momentous would be monstrous. There are surely in the Senate enough men with a sense for what is right and fitting to insist upon making such a fiasco impossible. And even if there were not, the moment the collapse came—the moment the country woke up to a realization of what had happened—a wave of indignation would sweep over the nation which would in itself suffice to prevent so lame and impotent a conclusion from being accepted as final.

With the treaty, then, once more before the Senate for final determination, what may be expected to be the outcome? What advance has been made toward a possible solution? The great advance is that extremes have been eliminated. The President's fight for acceptance without reservations is over, and his fight for keeping the reservations out of the act of ratification is over. On the other hand, all overt amendments have been killed, and those reservations that were of most subversive character have been killed, some of them having been defeated by majorities not far from two-thirds. Thus the problem of compromise has been brought down to narrow limits; the welter of possibilities in which the public mind has been floundering is replaced by the consideration of two or three simple points upon which public interest can be effectively focused.

Upon this foundation the moderate reservationists are now in a position to build with confidence. They are no longer hampered by the necessity of trying to effect a combination with either side. They demand from neither side anything which, in the present situation, could be obstinately rejected without incurring the odium of responsibility for the failure of the treaty. All that they have to do is to embody a just and rational compromise in definite form, and to state in clear and simple terms the grounds of its propriety and of its necessity. With the fateful result immediately in sight, and with all extreme expectations on either side now definitely abandoned, a solution thus offered would evoke from the common sense and the right feeling of the nation an almost unanimous response.

The opportunity is such as rarely comes to any man or any group of men to do an inestimable service to their country and to the world. The spirit which the moderate reservationists have manifested all along gives reason to hope that they will rise to the opportunity. They have not suffered themselves to be dragged along in the car of their party's leadership. They have plainly avowed that they were willing to enter into relations with the leaders of the opposite party for the promotion of the great end they had in view. They may justly claim, as Senator McCumber did the other day, that it was the refusal of the Administration forces to come to any kind of understanding with them which compelled them finally to make as good terms as they could with their own party leadership. With this clean record behind them, they can now face the nation with serene confidence that what they propose will be viewed with a favoring eye by good citizens throughout the country, whatever their political affiliations, who desire to see the best result attained which is now attainable, and who are little concerned with the effect that this may have upon the prestige of any man or upon the prospects of any party.

In spite of all that has come and gone, rejection of the treaty would be a calamity. It is true that French and British statesmen, French and British journalists, are now taking a very despondent view of what the participation of the United States in the League would amount to, even if the Lodge reservations were considerably modified. It is true that the same view is entertained by many in this country. But what men may feel in the first shock of realization that high hopes are doomed to disappointment is no sure index of the state of mind into which they will settle in presence of the accomplished fact. On the one hand, the fact of outright failure would bring about not only dejection incomparably deeper than that which the sense of disappointment is at present producing, but also, in all probability, a widespread commotion among the peoples, as distinguished from the public men, of the European nations. And on the other hand, it would require only a few significant betterments in the scheme of reservations to allay a great deal of the adverse feeling which it now arouses.

The mere fact that such changes had been adopted would be justly accepted as proof that not hostility to the objects of the League, but anxiety for the cardinal interests of America, had dictated our attitude. This, to be sure, must seem a sad declension to those who had hailed the League Covenant as the solution at a single stroke of the problem of all the ages. But while the treaty was still in the making at Versailles, and long before its final formulation, it had become evident to all who did not shut their eyes to facts that the League would at best be but a very distant approach toward such an ideal. Its merit consisted not in what it was, but in what men might cherish the hope that it would become. That hope rests on the good will of mankind, and not on the specific arrangements of a written document. It may have been dimmed by what has happened at Washington, but it has not been extinguished. It is our duty to do what in us lies to keep it alive. Few can now be found to hail the League as the great consummation which many regarded it six months ago; but neither are many so confident of their own judgment as to deny that it carries the possibility of great things, if it be but given time and opportunity. America will not look with equanimity upon a verdict which condemns it to death without a trial.

"The Broken Pledge"

THE New Republic scores a point in unearthing from the Congressional Record the following statement made by Senator Husting of Wisconsin on the floor of the Senate just before the passage of the Lever Food and Fuel Control bill:

I am authorized by the Secretary of Labor, Mr. Wilson, to say that the Administration does not construe this bill as prohibiting strikes and peaceful picketing and will not so construe the bill, and that the Department of Justice does not so construe the bill and will not so construe the bill.

"We believe," says the New Republic, "that it reveals a flagrant want of good faith towards labor on the part of the Wilson Administration." In expressing this belief in its editorial columns, it does not go beyond the bounds of legitimate criticism; but when it gives its cover page over to display of the same quotation in big type under the black-letter head "The Broken Pledge," it is guilty of that very kind of incitement of bad feeling upon an inadequate basis of fact which it is so given to unctuously re-proving when it discusses the alleged attitude of the daily press in relation to labor controversies. For, though it may be maintained that the Administration was seriously compromised by this statement of Senator Husting's, it is going far beyond the facts to represent that statement as a solemn pledge, of such character that no stress of circumstances, no provocation, no threat of disaster to the country, could justify action such as that which was taken in relation to the coal strike.

Let it be noted, in the first place, that what we have before us is the oral statement by a Senator of an oral assurance given to him by the head of one executive Department as to what the latter said he had been authorized to state as the position of another Department. Anybody who is familiar with the possibilities of inaccuracy or error that arise in such a situation must be aware that there is a world of difference between a direct statement by the President or the Attorney General and a statement that has thus filtered through two intervening media. The Secretary of Labor, speaking for himself, would have had no more authority in the matter than the Secretary of the Navy or the Postmaster General; and it may perfectly well be that Attorney General Gregory either did not personally express any view on the subject—in which case Secretary Wilson's statement would have been based on an assurance from some subordinate authority in the Department of Justice—or that if he did he may have used language different from that which was employed by the Secretary of Labor, and may have implied that while the law did not abolish the right to strike, that right could not be exercised in a manner that would throttle the whole country and thus defeat the entire purpose of the bill.

Let us look, next, at the influence of Senator Husting's statement upon the passage of the bill. It is safe to say that that influence was practically nil. The vote was taken within an hour or so of the making of the statement, and the bill was passed by a vote of 66 to 7—almost ten to one. It is doubtful whether a single vote was cast in its favor on account of Mr. Husting's statement, and it is safe to say that at most not more than a very few votes can have thus been changed at the last moment. This would be a safe conclusion on general principles; it is made quite certain by a reading of the debate that intervened between the making of the statement and the taking of the vote. The Senate had passed an amendment declaring that the bill did not apply to labor organizations; the House had rejected that amendment, and the conference committee had accepted the verdict of the House. The fact that under these circumstances the assurance given by Senator Husting would be a very slender reliance in case the bill became a law, was brought out with perfect clearness by Senator Reed; Senator Newlands, who spoke just before the vote was taken, and who voted for the bill, declared that he did so in spite of objecting to the effect he thought it would have in restricting the right to strike; and not a single Senator indicated that he attached any importance to Senator Husting's report of what Secretary Wilson said. The idea of a "pledge" is that of a promise made in order to obtain something in return; in this instance nothing was obtained, and there was no reason to imagine that anything could—at that last moment—be obtained.

But there is one more point, more important than any other. Every reader of the New Republic must get the impression, and must have been meant to get the impression, that the Administration had deliberately made this "pledge" in order to get the bill passed. Yet if the New Republic had quoted what immediately preceded the passage which it extracts from Senator Husting's speech, such an impression would have been impossible. "I was sufficiently interested," said Mr. Husting, "in the argument upon the legal effect of striking out the Hollis amendment to inquire from those who will have the administration of this law in their hands as to what construction would be placed upon it by them in the event that it became a law in its present form;" and then follows the above passage quoted by the New Republic. Thus it is upon the basis of a statement not made by the Administration of its own motion, not made at all by the President or by the Attorney General, and not made even by the Secretary of Labor except in response to a question asked by an individual Senator for the purpose of satisfying his own mind, that the New Republic deliberately puts the Administration into the pillory as an infamous breaker of a solemn pledge. Such off-hand branding applied to a Socialist agitator or a revolutionary labor leader would of course be an outrage; but since here it is only the President of the United States that is accused, and only the passions and prejudices of the enemies of the existing order that are inflamed, of course one need not be so particular.

Lawlessness and Human Nature

FEW things are easier than to cloak a bad lie in a bit of truth. The sharp outbursts of popular feeling occasioned by recent criminal aggressions of the I. W. W. and other lawless organizations are treated by a certain class among us as mere exhibitions of mob violence, not essentially different from anything else that goes by that rightly odious name. They are, of course, lawless, and it is the duty of the officers of the law sternly to repress them. But it is worth while to discriminate between things essentially unlike. To be punctiliously orderly and lawful towards classes pestiferously disorderly and unlawful is of course the ideal at which right-thinking citizens should aim. It is ordinarily impossible to vindicate law by breaking law, or successfully to employ disorder as a cure for its opposite. If the human mind and heart were geared to run with absolute logical precision, we might perhaps classify all lapses from law and order as immeasurably bad, and cease to worry over differences in degree. But men and deeds are what they are, and can best be transformed gradually into what they ought to be by recognizing them as they are and separating things that differ.

In the early days of the war, a certain class of "citizens" persisted in words and actions which, while just escaping the limits of criminal illegality, nevertheless plainly weakened and impeded our powers of resistance and gave aid and comfort to the enemy. If public opinion had not been outraged by such conduct, that very fact would have been the outward evidence of a state of mind incompatible with successful resistance, and Hohenzollern militarism would to-day be actively dominant over Europe, and potentially so over America as well. But that indignation the mere absence of which would be proof that genuine love of country had rotted from the nation's heart easily rises beyond the power of self-control, and personal assault upon the offenders against our cherished institutions, and those who support them, is the result. To treat these assaults as mere outbursts of criminal lawlessness, waxing as indignant against the perpetrators as against those who were guilty of the barbarities wreaked upon the non-combatants of Belgium, shows a lack of discrimination which the common sense of mankind instinctively rejects.

This blurring of moral distinctions during the war is identical with the spirit of pacifist journalists and radical extremists in their present attitude towards the current outbursts of public feeling against the professed enemies of this and every other established government. To these men anything established, such as a written law, a court house, a judge, a title deed to a home, an official record of marriages or births, a soldier or policeman, a line fence or a lock and key, is as irritating as a red rag to a bull. But to the large majority of our people these things are absolute prerequisites, not only to a comfortable and happy life now, but to any humanly conceivable improvement in civilization for the future. Into typical American communities, thoroughly loyal to law and order as a principle, and to their embodiment, although still imperfect, in their own governmental institutions, this anarchistic element has been more and more persistently thrusting itself, sowing the seeds of lawlessness and disorder, advocating the overthrow of all government, preaching sabotage, arson, pillage and murder, practicing any or all of these crimes when the opportunity presents itself, knifing the Government in the back when it was facing the foe on the field of battle, and now shooting down our returned soldiers as they parade the streets in celebration of the return of peace. A condition of mind which could look upon all this without intense indignation, especially where it is seen right at hand, as in many parts of the Northwest, would tell of national rottenness beyond repair. We wish that this indignation had been kept within self-control; to wish that it had not existed would be to wish for something immeasurably worse morally, and sure in the end to lead to immeasurably more violent infractions of law.

Of course, the officers of the law should do their utmost to restrain all illegal manifestations of such feeling, and in keeping it within bounds the agencies of the law should have the heartiest support of good citizens and of the press. But their efforts to this end will be only impeded, not helped, by the course of men whose perverseness of spirit, or weakness of understanding, leads them to charge the wrong only or chiefly against the one side that is possessed of a fundamental love of country and a strong partiality for institutions of law and order which had their birth in human experience, feeling its way slowly to a more satisfactory life. And the vigor of the law in suppressing these secondary disorders will be not merely useless, but positively harmful, if it does not go hand in hand with the utmost vigor in dealing with the more dangerous primary offenses by which the others are evoked. Nor should this work be hampered by false distinctions between men who commit crimes of treason or violence with their own hands, and those who confine their efforts to inciting crime in others.

SWINGS dismally from a bridge in Centralia the body of a man. What does America think of it, her eyes turned westward? Or are her eyes more regardful of the bodies of four of her soldier sons which lie crumpled in the public square of Centralia? You can tell much concerning the man who will honestly confess to you which spectacle cuts him most to the heart; you know all you need to know of the man who believes that nothing really happened at Centralia beyond a regrettable exhibition of mob fury.

But the body swinging from the bridge, later cut down and buried huger-mugger by four of his accomplices under guard, is worth a glance. The man's name is reported to be Wesley Everett. What the devil, Wesley Everett—the devil whom one-half of your name worsted in fight and whose existence the other half denied to his face—what the devil were you doing in that galley? Maybe that isn't your name; maybe the papers got it wrong. Maybe you just picked it up for convenience. Or maybe you were a sort of black sheep that the old folks have got over feeling bad about. Listen to a few things, Wesley. You are full of bullet holes and your kicking heels will never gain footing on the slipping waters of the Chehalis River. As well listen to a few things.

Do you know, Wesley, why you hang there? You are an anachronism. Hard to have your neck broken just for being an anachronism? That same has cost a wrench to many a fairer neck than that black swire of yours, Wesley. Just what you hoped to see, too, wasn't it?—some of them who go lolling by in their automobiles, fat with the food that belongs of right to the workingman. That was the talk, wasn't it? Revolution—up-so-downy? That's what proves you were an anachronism, Wesley.

Did you ever hear, Wesley, of Oliver Cromwell?—an English country gentleman—a farmer, if you like, and no friend, by the way, to some of your Irish friends. It was a sad business, Wesley, a costly business; but what can you do when you've a king on your hands who proposes to bend a whole nation to his own sweet will? Served him right! Sic semper, in effect? Ah, it's not so simple as that; but it settled some things, Wesley—that and what came after, down to and including the business to which another English gentleman set his hand. Yes—Washington. It was settled, Wesley, once and for all, that the people rule. And if they change their minds, they know how to change their rule without going in for revolution, Wesley. That's finished, that's out of date, that's an anachronism. Too bad to swing there, Wesley, for being a reactionary.

How did it happen you didn't know that, Wesley? The fellows—you know them—that you call "Charlie" and "Jake" because you don't know what their real names are and couldn't pronounce 'em if you did—perhaps they're not so much to blame. They're raw; they didn't get these things settled a couple of hundred years ago; didn't get it out of their systems when they were young and could stand it. If you'd been born a German or a Russian it would be easier to understand. But how did they rope you in to help them sow their political wild oats in a country that had been plowed and cropped to that harvest before your great-grandfather was born? Too bad to swing there, Wesley, for being a fool.

Was there a weak spot in you, Wesley? There is, in some of the best; gives way most astonishingly sometimes. That business of Cromwell's—it wasn't finished to the satisfaction of some. They wanted more than they got, got more than it was good for the world to let them keep. Never heard of the Independents? No, just Independents, nothing more. Never heard of the "root and branch" men? Put it into Latin and you'll understand—Radicals. Or the Fifth Monarchy men? Or the Anabaptists? The kind that want to remake the world from the bottom up, with themselves on top; the "lunatic fringe" of Puritanism, and always coming out strong when Puritanism dominates. It took chiefly a religious form in the old days, but many things were lumped under religion then. It's not the core of the matter, nor the bulk, but a kind of diffused maggotry. Nowadays it's as likely to be atheist as religious; "Bohemian" as Prohibition; or it might be atheist and Prohibition both at once; you never can tell. It's as likely to be fanatically immoral as fanatically moral. But it's always fanatic, it always feels that it must be busy establishing some new kind of kingdom. That's what's the trouble with some of your rich friends, Wesley, who egged you on. It proved too much for Cromwell, but not too much for the English people; they knew how to smother it. But it's always with us, Wesley; the dregs of Puritanism working out, and working strong just now. After all, perhaps you do come honestly by your name. Too bad, Wesley Everett, to swing there for being a Puritan.

Little enough time to go into detail, Wesley. They'll be along presently to cut you down—clear you out of the way. There were some things you honestly had on your heart. Some things that aren't quite fair. Fewer than there used to be, Wesley, though more than in good time there will be. But you went the wrong way round in your folly, you and your foreign friends and your rich "intellectual" friends, blasted and unwholesome buddings of the Puritan stock. There's a better way, aye and a shorter way, and the world will take it. It's known you and your like this many a long year. They're coming now to cut you down, Wesley. Forgive the uncivil despatch of it all. There's the devil in all of us, who'll come out if he's sufficiently invited. You'll understand, of course, and forgive. You don't want to swing there forever, Wesley, blocking the path.

Woman's Chance In Public Affairs

ANNOUNCEMENT is made that the National American Woman's Suffrage party intends shortly to vote itself out of existence. In line with the action of the State organizations, the National Suffrage party is to become the National League of Women Voters. The fight, in other words, is over, the victory won, or almost as good as won; and the party militant becomes the party triumphant. Justice, so far as it was a question of justice, has been done and Heaven has not fallen—no sensible person really expected it would—either in wrathful destruction or to inaugurate its reign on earth. The fact, in fine, is accomplished, and that amounts to saying that it now begins to be important. Everything having been done, everything remains to do.

Three questions very much on the conscience of the nineteenth century—the question of slavery, the question of equality of rights and privileges between the sexes, and the question of prohibition—have each in its way passed beyond the realm of question into the realm of fact. In large measure, the three went together—the mind that was strongly agitated by one of them was, as a rule, agitated by all of them. But not one of them actually made substantial advance to a settlement on what might roughly be called moral grounds alone. The question of slavery was the first of them to attach itself to a political vehicle in which it was finally borne to a settlement. Upon the sequel of that settlement, it is not possible to look with unalloyed satisfaction; the problem it left behind is still with us.

The prohibition issue, under stress of war and fortified by a social habit that had come somewhat loosely to regard the question as a factor in "efficiency," has only just now succeeded in furnishing itself with a political vehicle that could carry it out of the realm of morals—of life as some people think it ought to be—into the realm of life as it is. And its triumph appears too factitious, involving on one side a stern elation that may easily over-reach itself and on the other an easy assent that may stubbornly reverse itself, to encourage a belief that the problem once settled—and it is not even settled yet—will be anywhere but on our hands.

Far brighter hopes, however, may reasonably be entertained concerning the third problem—equality of suffrage. Upon the emancipated slave was prematurely laid a task greater than he proved able to bear. Upon society, prohibition lays a task the seriousness of whose difficulties remains to be disclosed. Upon emancipated woman is laid a task to which there is every reason to believe she is equal. Fortunately, it has come upon her only gradually. Thousands of women have gone quietly about the business of demonstrating their ability to enhance economic productivity in time of peace and to bear an equal and indispensable share in the production of society in time of war. So long as the question was "Why?", suffrage had no standing in life as it is; when life as lived by a goodly number of women was potent to change the question into "Why not?", suffrage becomes a fact.

In this case, then, the question is not whether the new institution will work, but what it will accomplish. Such a beginning as renounces the notion of the formation of a separate woman's party, of any effort to organize and deliver the votes of women as a whole, points the course of wisdom. Politically, it seems to say, women will trust those instincts which for better or worse they share with men, and express them in ways which men have already found more or less workable; women will vote as constituent members of mankind and not as ambassadors from another world, angelic or what not. Next, it may be taken as meaning that they will not be too immediately avid of power, as power. Who through the ages have learned to rule without seeming to rule will not lightly cast aside a strength as real as it is unique for the empty honor of office, impotent if it comes too soon. The test of too sudden political responsibility on a large scale she may pray to be spared.

Success in this new political experiment rests on the breadth and soundness of its foundations. Yet there are large numbers of women in every community on a sudden endowed with a franchise which, whether they know how to use it or not, they do not particularly wish to use at all. Part of this potential vote its leaders may exploit; part of it they may frighten or disgust into permanent inactivity; all of it, or most of it, they may, if they move wisely, educate to the point of recognizing a responsibility which cannot be evaded, which must be exercised, and which must, in its exercise, operate for good or very definite ill. Women may, that is, allow themselves to be organized and set up for sale to political bosses who will bid them in in exchange for a few offices, or they may first go quietly about the discharge of certain specialized political tasks, exercising their general functions as well as they can—they can hardly do worse in this respect than a great many men do—and thus hope measurably to alter the efficient machinery of politics instead of merely adding to its bulk.

Some of the political functions to which women are most immediately adapted, not so much through particular disabilities on their part as through special aptitudes, were ably pointed out in an article in last week's REVIEW. They are, in a word, those which vitally affect the community, such as the education in seemly American living of the alien resident, the mental and physical health of the child in the school, order and comeliness in public places, and the general enrichment of the civic life. These tasks should not be contemptuously termed small because they demand a certain fineness which men have seldom brought to their execution. They can be valued highly not only for their own sake but for the educative opportunity they afford. For unless women eventually educate themselves to be in some respects better voters than the men have been, and educate the men by the way, the world may be half-inclined to regret that it ever laid upon them the burden—along with the privilege—of the ballot box.

The Two Bolshevisms

AT last the country has awakened to the Red menace, yet this awakening is far from being comprehensive and satisfactory. It is rather that of the good-natured giant, who, aroused by the mordant and repulsive activities of a lot of fleas, strikes about him wildly and disposes of a certain number of the tiny pests, without eradicating the nuisance. Radicals are being rounded up all over the country, I. W. W. and Bolshevik headquarters raided, tons of seditious and inflammatory propaganda literature seized, and in a few instances radical leaders held for trial. All of this is well as far as it goes, but it is a very superficial way of dealing with a serious problem.

The vast majority of the persons arrested are ignorant aliens. Sometimes their offense is distributing revolutionary circulars; sometimes it is attending radical meetings. In reality they are more sinned against than sinning. Few indeed of them would be engaged in such activities, or subject to the incitement of vicious agitators, if they had been given but a slight understanding of what America and its free institutions really mean to them. If in their ignorance they are abandoned to the wiles of unscrupulous leaders who befuddle their childish minds with Socialistic patter and high-sounding, hate-inciting phrases about "capitalism" and "imperialism," the result is our own, and it is the price that we must pay for our neglect to take the necessary and obvious steps to assimilate this part of our population and establish their economic well-being.

A large portion, perhaps ninety per cent. or more, of those who have run afoul of the authorities are illiterate Russians. They are, by nature, a simple, kindly folk, imaginative, idealistic, and thirsty for education. Practically the only institutions that have been at work on them and that have attempted to satisfy this craving for knowledge have been the well-financed Bolshevik organizations, together with their skilled propagandists. Given a chance of anything better, they seize it with avidity. A good illustration of this is the recently organized Russian Collegiate Institute. Educated and intelligent Russians in this city some time ago recognized the danger and the menace. They knew that if these conditions continued, their ignorant compatriots would either develop into a bad element here or, provided they returned to Russia, would bring with them no enlightened understanding of American institutions, and would constitute a further source of disorder. Out of their own scanty resources they contributed the funds to start a school. Then the Carnegie Foundation generously came to their support. Now they are reaching thousands of men, women, and children every week with lectures and night classes, non-partisan and non-political. The striking and illuminating thing is that hundreds of simple Russians who call themselves Bolsheviks are flocking to the Institute. This points the way clearly to the enlightened treatment of one side of the problem of the Red menace.

But there are two entirely distinct Bolshevisms, and a confusion between the two is responsible for much of our blundering in dealing with a state of affairs that constitutes the greatest threat to civilization since the fall of Rome.

One Bolshevism is that phenomenon which swept over Russia and which in various manifestations threatens to engulf the rest of Europe. Theoretically, it is the putting into practice of Marxian communism. These doctrines, so impracticable that they fall down when tried out, would have had few followers had it not been for the war. It was the mass-psychology resulting from the war that made whole peoples receptive to their contagion. Millions of men are taken from their accustomed surroundings and for years lead a dreary existence in the trenches, without the dash and changing scene of open warfare. The romance is gone and everywhere is nothing but violence and suffering. Individuality is crushed and the primitive instincts come to the surface. There is sullen resentment at the men at home who enjoyed security and profited. Inequalities of wealth and position stand forth in hated relief. The old order has broken down and a new one must be set up that will do away with these inequalities. What a man desires he must take with his own right arm.

This was the fertile ground into which the seeds of communistic theory were scattered. Unrest there was already, hunger and the breakdown of economic life had prepared the way. Do not think of the Bolshevism that followed as merely disorder and mob rule. It had in the beginning its idealistic side, for millions of weary folk believed they saw just ahead a Utopia, where the workers should inherit the earth, where drones should no longer fatten on the toil of others, where comfort and happiness should be the lot of all. Such was the vision dangled before the eyes of hungry and desperate men by unscrupulous leaders with their glib phrases about capitalism, imperialism, and the exploiting bourgeoisie. Bitterly were they to repent later, when the mirage had faded.

The other Bolshevism is something far different and its true nature is now beginning to appear. It is a plot so gigantic and comprehensive that it staggers the imagination, a conspiracy to set up a world-autocracy. When Trotzky explained his plans to a friend in America some twelve years ago, they sounded so wild and improbable as to raise doubts as to his sanity. Yet to-day they are being fulfilled to the letter and the insignificant little soap-box orator and pamphleteer holds under his sway a hundred million people, terrorized and inert.

The plan of the plot was cynical and ruthless to the last degree. All civilized governments were in turn to be undermined, corrupted, and broken down. Every sort of treachery, deceit, intimidation, bribery, and corruption was to be employed. Presidents and legislators subservient to them were to be elected and then to be held in line by blackmail. Public taste was to be debauched, and the universities were to be penetrated with the teaching of fallacious economic doctrines. Strikes were to be fomented and Socialism was to be spread as a means of arousing among the workmen hatred against the bourgeoisie. Russia would furnish the first opportunity for seizing power, since a revolution among this ignorant people would bring chaos.

The war gave them their chance. The Bolshevism first mentioned was their instrument. They had prepared the ground well beforehand and their thousands of agents, utterly unscrupulous, adepts at lying propaganda, and stopping at no crime, were at work everywhere. Thousands of these flocked into Russia after the March revolution, and presently they overturned the Government. Everything went according to schedule. They made the poor deluded people believe that a workingmen's government had been set up, and proceeded to exterminate all the bourgeoisie and intelligentsia who would not take service under them and do their bidding. Then they boldly seized power and set up such an autocracy and tyranny as even Russia had never seen, doing lip service meanwhile to the Bolshevik formulas, but using a mercenary army and ruthless terror to exercise absolute power over the cowed and helpless people. Such is Bolshevism at Moscow to-day.

But their scheme is not yet complete. They have created an army under iron discipline, but they have not been able to do constructive and productive work. The rottenness and corruption which they invoked to achieve power now remain to curse them. They are threatened on all sides by armies of loyal Russia. To retain their power and extend it, they must cause revolution elsewhere, or, failing in this, they must so disrupt the forces against them that other nations will perforce swallow their disgust and make peace with them, thus giving them a breathing space to prepare for the overthrow of other Governments. Their weapon as before is propaganda. In the use of it they are past-masters and in employing it they shrink from no crime.

This is the Bolshevism that threatens America. The other sort we can take care of easily. Just let the I. W. W. and other radicals start riots and see how quickly they will be crushed and their perpetrators punished. Let William Z. Foster and his kind incite revolutionary strikes, and the American people will speak in no uncertain tone. But the other Bolshevik activities are more insidious and dangerous, and imprisoning or deporting a few hundred ignorant aliens will not thwart them. Their agents are active in all walks of life and many of their clever schemes are so well cloaked as to enlist the assistance of hosts of well-meaning people, who do not realize that they are being duped. So, for example, they start an association for labor legislation, an association against intervention in Mexico, an association for the liberation of oppressed peoples, an association for lifting the blockade against Soviet Russia. They circulate a mass of lies and misrepresentation concerning the situation in Russia and bring influence to bear on needy or corrupt politicians and venal journals. These are the sort of activities we must trace out and combat if we are to meet the real Bolshevik danger and defeat the attempt to establish the new autocracy.

JEROME LANDFIELD

The Rights of the Senate

PUBLIC interest in the issues immediately at stake in the contest over the completion of the Treaty of Versailles on the part of the United States has been so great that comparatively little attention, either official or unofficial, has been given to the Constitutional aspects of the struggle. Yet as we irrevocably set our course upon the sea of world affairs nothing can be more important than that our Constitutional point of departure should be the true one, and that both we and others should understand the chart by which we must sail. And the developments of the last four months have made plain that it is particularly to be hoped that both at home and abroad there may be an intelligent understanding of the Constitutional position of the Senate in treaty-making. Concerning no aspect of this position has misunderstanding been more general than with reference to the respective powers and duties of the President and the Senate in the negotiation, as distinct from the ratification of treaties.

That this misunderstanding has been shared, and consequently fostered, by Mr. Wilson may partially explain his failure to utilize any of the well-recognized means by which he might have attempted to secure in advance a reasonable agreement between the Senate and himself with reference to the terms of the treaty. To those who may find it difficult to believe that so high an authority as a President of the United States could possibly err in such a matter, we would cite the patent and undeniable misunderstanding of the Senate procedure upon treaties which Mr. Wilson revealed upon his second return from Europe as a reminder that, after all, no man is infallible.

Mr. Wilson's conception of the Constitutional position of the Senate in the negotiation of treaties was revealed by the remarkable statement which he made on August 28 in declining to submit to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations the then uncompleted treaties with Austria and certain other countries. He wrote:

I am sure that the Committee on Foreign Relations will appreciate the undesirability of creating the precedent which would be created by submitting treaties in their draft form. It would tend to take the function of negotiating treaties out of the hands of the Executive, where it is expressly vested by the Constitution (The italics are the writer's).

That the President should have addressed this constitutional dictum to Senator Lodge may be regarded as one of those coincidences which are not infrequent in public life. For in 1902, a year far removed from the "partisanship" of to-day, the Senator from Massachusetts wrote for Scribner's Magazine an admirable essay upon this very subject. In this essay he quoted the Constitutional provision with reference to appointments to office, in order to define more clearly the one relating to treaties:

He (the President) shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, etc.

Mr. Lodge then adds:

It is well to note that the carefully phrased section gives the President absolute and unrestricted right to nominate, and the Senate can only advise and consent to the appointment of a given person. All right to interfere in the remotest degree with the power of nomination and the consequent power of selection is wholly taken from the Senate. Very different is the wording of the treaty clause. There the words "by and with the advice and consent of" come in after the words "shall have power" and before the power referred to is defined. The "advice and consent of the Senate" are therefore coextensive with the "power" conferred upon the President, which is "to make treaties," and apply to the entire process of treaty-making.

Senator Lodge concludes that, except for their want of authority to send or to receive diplomatic agents, and their consequent inability to initiate a negotiation, the Senate, under the language of the Constitution and in the intent of the framers, stands on a perfect equality with the President in the making of treaties. The President, not by "express" grant, but as a part of his power to "make treaties," through his sole right to send and to receive diplomatic agents, and from the very nature of his office is, indeed, charged with the actual conduct of all negotiations with foreign Powers. But in the matter of treaties, the Constitution clearly provides that he shall negotiate, as well as ratify them, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

It is further set forth in Senator Lodge's essay that after Washington had found it inexpedient always to consult the Senate prior to or during the negotiation of treaties, this course has been followed only occasionally; and, in his authoritative work on the subject, Samuel B. Crandall cites twelve "exceptional" cases in which later Executives have followed out the clear intention of the framers of the Constitution, in consulting the Senate prior to the opening of negotiations. The fact is that experience showed both Washington and the Senate of his day that the Constitutional plan was impracticable, and in consequence formal consultation concerning negotiations was dropped at the time of the Jay treaty. Washington, however, met both the Constitutional and the practical needs of the situation by assuring himself of Senatorial support through close cooperation with individual Senators who actually could speak for the majority of their colleagues. Most of his successors have followed his example by availing themselves of the recognized facilities for contact offered by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. The Senate, as a rule, has been satisfied with this arrangement, and its acceptance of the substance without stickling as to the form of its prerogative has in no way vitiated its Constitutional rights and duties in the matter.

Now, if Mr. Wilson really believes, and there is no reason for doubting his sincerity, that "the function of negotiating treaties" is "expressly vested by the Constitution" in the "hands of the Executive," his course in practically ignoring the Senate prior to and during the negotiations at Paris, and his attitude towards Senatorial opposition since his return to this country become more comprehensible than they otherwise are.

They do not, however, become less inimical to the present and the future interests of the United States, or less out of harmony with the Constitution. The long struggle which has delayed the consummation and jeopardized the very existence of the Treaty of Peace with Germany, threatened the safety of the world, and raised doubts in many quarters as to the good faith and disinterestedness of the United States is, in large measure, the result of the President's application of his theory that the Senate has no Constitutional function in treaty-making save that of consenting, or refusing to consent, to the ratification of a completed agreement. If Mr. Wilson's understanding is to be accepted as valid, and it has been little questioned, it follows that the makers of the Constitution deliberately provided a treaty-making process which is likely at any time to produce such dangerous delays and deadlocks. It must be assumed that they created an inefficient and defective instrument for the performance of one of the most important functions of government. To reach this conclusion, however, one must ignore one of the fundamental canons of Constitutional construction, and do violence to the plain language of the treaty clause in order to obtain a meaning less desirable and less in harmony with the rest of the instrument than that which is derived from a plain reading of the provision in question. Such a thing is not to be done. The framers meant just what they said when they empowered the President "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties." And there can be no doubt that the obligation imposed by the qualifying phrase is a legal as well as a moral one.

If the President of the United States can have so misunderstood the Constitutional rights and duties of his colleagues in treaty-making, it is not strange that both American and foreign thought on the subject should be a bit hazy. Should the misconception be confirmed, a serious injury will have been done to one of the most characteristic of our institutions. Although they have formally acquiesced in it, foreigners have never liked, or really understood, the Constitutional provision which makes it possible for the Senate to prevent the ratification of a treaty which the President has caused to be signed. Had Mr. Wilson succeeded in forcing the ratification of the Treaty of Versailles "without the crossing of a t or the dotting of an i," his success would have been accepted abroad, and at home, too, as the vindication of his conception of the respective powers and duties of the President and the Senate with reference to all treaties. In consequence, every American diplomat who, in future negotiations, should attempt to include or to exclude any provision under plea of being to some extent under Senatorial control, would have found the ground largely cut from under his feet. Not only would the operation of our peculiar system of treaty-making have been made more difficult, but our position in future diplomatic struggles would have been materially weakened. As to domestic politics, the Senate already is at an obvious disadvantage in any contest with the President, who, if he possess the qualities of national leadership, is in a position to override any other department of the Government which may oppose him—as Mr. Wilson himself pointed out while still a professor of politics. Once let it be generally understood that the President is under no obligation even to attempt to reach some understanding with the Senate before signing treaties, which thereafter can be altered only at great cost, and not only are many of the advantages which this country has drawn from its Constitutional method of treaty-making gone forever, but the door is opened either to autocratic executive control, or to confusion and weakness in the conduct of our foreign relations.

Thus a Constitutional issue of real importance has been involved in the struggle of the past four months. And the outcome is, in large extent, on the myriad laps of the great god Demos. If Senators can make clear to our own people, and to those of other nations, the real nature of the Constitutional responsibilities in treaty-making which rest upon them and upon the President, they will have performed a genuine service to the nation, no matter what may be the more immediate result of their action upon the treaty itself.

Correspondence

Judge Rose on the Reservations

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Many of the differences over some of the proposed reservations to the League Covenant grow out of the fact that the President of the United States does not hold office at the will of Congress. This is especially true as to the reservations concerning Article X. The Council of the League seldom can act except by unanimous consent, that is by the vote of our representative in it. Foreign editors are asking why, then, does anyone wish that before any determination of the Council shall be even morally binding upon America it must be approved by Congress? They do not hear that anyone in other countries desires anything of the kind. Why do any of us?

The answer is because the centre of gravity in our Constitutional system does not lie where it does in theirs. No Premier in England, France, or Italy could keep his place if he instructed or permitted his country's representative in the Council to vote contrary to the strongly held convictions of the majority of his Parliament. He rules his country so long as he has the political confidence of his chambers, and no longer.

Our history shows that for nearly half the time one or both houses of Congress are controlled by the party opposed to the Administration for the time being. In only nineteen of the thirty-three Congresses chosen since the formation of the Republican party have both branches been in even nominal accord with the President. In many of those in which he and the majority of each chamber belong to the same political party he failed to obtain its approval for some important item of his programme; as, for example, a Democratic House refused to assent to Buchanan's recommendation that Kansas should be admitted under the Lecompton Constitution, and a Republican Senate refused to ratify Grant's treaty for annexing San Domingo.

If the recommendations of the League Council shall be held to have any morally obligatory force here, it will necessarily follow that to the extent that they are binding they will become so by the approval of the President alone, for he will appoint and instruct our members of the Council. Congress will have no voice in it, except to do what may be necessary to give effect to an obligation which we cannot in honor repudiate. The President of the United States will exercise a power which no one else in any of the great nations of the world now has, the Mikado perhaps excepted.

There are those who believe it is not well to invest any one man with so great and so unchecked an authority. They feel that neither our country nor our Presidents will be the better for it. On the other hand, it is hard for the people of our allies to understand our Constitutional system well enough to put themselves in our place. They are puzzled why some of us, alone among the nations, are asking for an unlimited right to review the decisions of the League. That it is possible we shall do so may well seem to many of them both selfish and insolent.

A League which must ask the approval of the American Congress for every one of its important judgments will lose not a little of its prestige, and that is no trifling matter.

It is not the purpose of this letter to intimate any opinion as to whether it will be less dangerous so greatly to increase the Presidential power than to make the League seem to many men of many lands a weak and feeble thing. All that is intended is to point out that we shall do one or the other.

Dr. Beilby Porteus

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Can you or any of your readers give any information on the life of Dr. Beilby Porteus, Bishop of London, 1787 to 1808?

In some way he became deeply indebted to one of my ancestors, as is shown by letters from him which we still have in the family and by the fact that he interested himself greatly in the welfare of my grandfather.

There is a tradition in the family that in his youth he was sent to America as an indentured prisoner, having been arrested as a sympathizer with the cause of the young pretender; that his indenture was bought by a Mr. Jennings of Annapolis, whose daughter had married one of my forebears in Virginia, and that he was employed as tutor in the family of this daughter of Mr. Jennings.

From the short sketch of him given in the Encyclopædia Britannica it would seem that it could hardly be possible that he ever came to America under such circumstances as are recited, but there seems to be an hiatus in his life in that account from 1731, the date of his birth, to 1752, and it might of course be possible.

Any information bearing on this would be greatly appreciated.

Laurier's Poetic Work

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

While the late Sir Wilfried Laurier was recognized as an orator of the first rank, in both French and English, his speeches, in Parliament and elsewhere, being marked by deep thought, statesman-like conceptions, and elegance of diction, none ever suspected that in his early days he had actually wooed the Muses. His public addresses on all manner of subjects are really poems in prose. Few men of his day, in Canada or elsewhere, had so perfect a command of the English language. Here and there in his speeches sparkle gems of poetic thought, but that he ever attempted to write verse was never suspected. It is also remarkable that his poems were all written between 1863 and 1867. It would seem as if, with the coming of Confederation and the opening out of a great political career for this young man, he abandoned the Muses to devote all his talents and energies to the achievement of something more important for his country and fellow-countrymen. Be that as it may, the fact remains that his sole efforts in the line of verse are confined to that period when his health was poor and his future was exceedingly uncertain.

Like Thomas D'Arcy McGee, and like Hon. Joseph Howe, Laurier wrote his sentiments in verse before launching into the more rugged career of a politician. Moreover, his youth was cast in a time and amongst men whose literary successes have shed a glow upon the sky of Canadian letters—especially French Canadian literature.

He completed his classical course and his law studies and began the practice of his profession in the days of Crémazie, Faucher-de-Saint-Maurice, Legendre, Chapman, Louis Honoré Fréchette, Pamphile Lemay, Garneau the historian, Arthur Buies, Lusignan, and a host of minor poets and pamphleteers; it was also the period in which flourished some of the brightest lights in Canadian journalism—Dansereau, Trudel, Tasse, Barthelot, and their contemporaries; his life-long and most intimate friend and associate, both in law and in letters, was the present Senator L. O. David, whose prolific pen has done more, perhaps, than any other to embellish the pages of French Canadian history and traditions. Breathing the same atmosphere as such men, living in such surroundings, it is not at all to be wondered at that young Laurier should have absorbed some of that spirit which impells the young man to court the deities from Olympus.

The following are two of the shorter poems which the pen of the eminent statesman traced in those far away days when life was just commencing for him.

POEME INEDIT

(Le 5 janvier, 1863)

Comme l'onde qui fuit de rivage en rivage,
Sans suspendre jamais son cours sur nulle page,
Tels poussés du destin qui nous tient enchaînés
Nos jours fuient du berceau vers la tombe entraînés.

Le Temps marche toujours d'une aile infatigable;
Il n'est point de repos pour sa main redoutable;

Elle va, détruisant, bâtissant, tour à tour,
Pour bâtir et détruire encore un autre jour.

Si quelque éclair de joie illumine ma vie,
En vain je crie au Temps, en vain je le supplie
De ralentir l'essor de son vol destructeur,
De me laisser jouir d'un instant de bonheur.

Comme un gladiateur dans la cité romaine,
Aux cent mille braves du peuple dans l'arène,
Etreint son ennemi de son bras de géant,
L'étouffe, et plein d'orgueil, le rejette sanglant,

Tel le Temps me saisit dans le sein de ma joie;
Il m'entraîne avec lui, comme l'aigle sa proie;
Il m'abandonne enfin, sa main me laisse aller,
Pour me reprendre, et puis, me laisser retomber.

A UN PAPILLON

(En mai, 1867)

Doux petit papillon, à peine dans la nuit
Commence de briller ma lampe solitaire,
Comme le plomb fatal qui vers le but s'enfuit,
Tu tombes palpitant sur la pâle lumière.

Et chaque fois pourtant tes pures ailes d'or
A la flamme brûlante ont laissé des parcelles;
Quel atroce plaisir peut t'amener encore
Y chercher aujourd'hui des tortures nouvelles?

Comme toi, papillon, jadis naïf enfant,
A gravir du succès l'inaccessible cime,
J'ai versé sans profit le meilleur de mon sang,
Et de ma folle ardeur suis retombé victime.

These selections are offered by one who knew Laurier in 1877, at the dawn of his political life in Quebec East, and to whom the dead statesman wrote, on December 20, last, one month before his death: "your remarks in your letter of yesterday are but another confirmation of our life-long and unclouded friendship." To translate these relics, from splendid French verse into very halting English, has been a labor of considerable difficulty, but, until they appear in book form, readers of the Review will find enjoyment in the originals.

Queries the World Over

THE STRONGEST (Les Plus Forts). By Georges Clemenceau. New York: Doubleday, Page and Company.

THE PALE HORSE. By "Ropshin" (Boris Savinkov). Translated from the Russian by Z. Veugerova. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.

AN ADOPTED HUSBAND (Sono Omokage). A Translation from the Original Japanese of Futabatei by Buchachiro Mitsui and Gregg M. Sinclair. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.

SO far as can be made out by the casual reader (for the publishers are singularly noncommittal in their announcements) most of these books, now first put into English, were written years ago. None of them alludes to the war, or clearly describes it in the immediate future. But with singular unanimity they are all concerned with those conflicting forces and ideals which, a decade or two decades ago, already menaced the disruption of civilization. From Spain, France, Norway, Russia, India, Japan, they bring their bits of testimony to the struggles, conscious or unconscious, going on the world over, in the early years of this century, between the individual and the social ideal, between the strong and the weak, between convenience and justice, between "the home and the world"—the very matters with which the ante-bellum fiction of England and America were chiefly concerned.

The author of "The Pale Horse" has borne his active part in the affairs of modern Russia. Son of a Russian official, he became in youth a terrorist; had part in the killing of Grand Duke Sergius and von Plehve; was condemned to death, but escaped to Switzerland. In the late war he fought with the French till the Russian Revolution, when he joined the Russian Army, later becoming Kerensky's Minister of War. . . . This is a tale out of his early experiences as a revolutionary. It does not sentimentalize the business of intrigue and assassination. But it helps us comprehend the paradox of the Russian soul, which, bitterly distrusting itself, yet seeks to destroy whatever has the air of being beyond and above itself. The five or six conspirators of the story are dreamers, egotists, mystics, sensualists, lovers, and avengers, all in a jumble. Vania, with his kindly nature and pious heart, is yet sworn to "the cause"; it is he who slays the Governor. So fate wills: "It's impossible to break the chain," he mourns. "There is no way out for me, none whatever. I am out to kill, yet I believe in the Word, I adore Christ. Oh, the agony of it!" George, who professes to have no faith nor hope nor joy in anything, and is also out to kill, succeeds in killing only his mistress's husband, an object of his personal jealousy—and finally himself, the object of his supreme contempt. Beneath his defiance and despair remains the unwilling recognition of that without which life has no meaning: "I recall: 'He that loveth not, knoweth not God: for God is love.' I do not love, and I do not know God. Vania knew. . . . Did he really know?"

"An Adopted Husband" is the work (some fifteen years old or more) of one of the first of Japanese writers to study and imitate foreign methods in fiction. The new Japan of the eighties could not be content with her outworn conventional forms of story-telling. "Futabatei" studied Russian literature, translated Turgeniev, and turned, with many of his contemporaries, to naturalism from the wooden unreality of classical Japanese fiction. The "adopted husband" of this story is a weak, well-meaning, ill-fated victim of conditions and forces with which he cannot cope. He is victim of a mechanical marriage, a malicious mother-in-law, a belated passion, a gradual crushing by the commercialized society of which the smug and prosperous Hamura is exemplar. Hamura "succeeds" in life; Tetsuya, with his fine if feeble nature, goes to the wall.

"Caesar or Nothing," is also a tale of defeated idealism. Why is Pio Baroja, as certainly peer as contemporary of the now famous Blasco Ibañez, so little acceptable, speaking relatively, to English and American readers? Two important novels of his have now been for some time before us in English dress. They are full of wit, of human nature, of a cool yet wistful irony. Their persons, their conversation, have extraordinary verisimilitude. But they lack the "big bow-wow" strain, the large impressive gesture, and rotund voice that have made Blasco Ibañez master of a huge miscellaneous audience. Baroja would not be able to pretend to take that audience quite seriously. Yet that audience, or the great majority it hints at, is in a way his theme, or at least the object of his solicitude. His Caesar Moncada, like the young hero of "The City of the Discreet," is a Spaniard of uncommonly good mind and broad education who puts himself on the side of the people in their dawning struggle against the tyranny of the priest-ridden state. The one signalizes his surrender of his generous youth by entering the fight for worldly and individual success. The other, Caesar, finding it impossible to be himself, that is, to be useful in his world, becomes frankly "nothing": the faintly mocking dilettante husband of a rich wife; not beneath, or above, occasional mention by fellow-collectors or in the "society column." A book that ends with a sigh and a smile and a shrug offers little comfort to an ambitious proletariat, and is by no means framed to take the Great Half-Baked by storm.

"Les Plus Forts," now rendered (anonymously) into English, seems to have been written a good many years ago, while the Tiger of France was earning his nickname as a leader of the Radical forces in French politics. Admirable as a novel, it is also an eloquent deposition in the case of the higher civilization against what we have learned to call Prussianism. The triumphant bourgeois Harlé, with his insatiable pursuit of money and power, preaches openly the doctrine of "the strongest," born to dominate; challenges the majority to show their superior power to rule the world—beneficently. He concedes no rights in the industrial and social fields that are not won in fair fight. Offset against him is the "fallen feudal chieftain," Marquis de Puymafray. Out of his libertine youth he has rescued one great devotion, which reveals to him the barrenness of a world ruled by self-seeking. These two are lifelong intimates; and the struggle of creeds centres in their battle for the soul of the girl Claudia Harlé, who is really the child of Puymafray's love. Harlé, with his millions and their attendant luxuries and pleasures, wins for the time, but we leave Puymafray confident that in the end Claudia, like humanity at large, will perceive that we are all of one body and can only work out our destiny by loving one another and helping one another.

"The Home and the World" is of simpler and firmer texture than anything with the Tagore label thus far composed or conveyed in English. It lifts a hand of caution against the perils to the individual and the family of a loose egotism which, consciously or unconsciously, pursues license and personal gain in the name of liberty and humanity. And it says a word for loyalty to ties upon which the sacred past has set its seal. Readers for whom the name Tagore, for all its recent "vogue," has persistently connoted a rather musky and enervating mysticism may find plenty of vigor and plain human feeling in this story.

"The Face of the World" is similar in temper, almost in theme, to "The Great Hunger," which not long since introduced this distinguished Norwegian novelist to readers of English. Peer Holm, you recall, having lost everything, having suffered every malice of fate and his fellow men, finds his soul and dauntlessly bears witness to his faith: "I went and sowed corn in my enemy's field that God might exist." So the Howard Mark of this story seems to have spent himself in vain. His generous efforts for a new brotherhood among men, his quiet service of a community, alike are flouted and brought to nothing. . . . "Dreams are a crime. Realities are money, robbery, police, prison, and war. The rest is nonsense. You who try to take a share in everything that happens, you with the wounded, bleeding world's conscience, you stretch yourself upon the cross and bleed like a fool. You help no one. Reality continues its course." Thus speaks his despair; until, through the window of the Ninth Symphony, comes a saving revelation: that Beethoven, the great dreamer, like all his greater or lesser fellow-dreamers, cannot have lived and testified for naught. Even he, Howard Mark, has his little place in that great company: "Dreamers, and yet they are the torch-bearers in the procession of mankind; and it is owing to them that there is not night over the earth."

A Symposium on the League of Nations

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS, the Principle and the Practice. Edited by Stephen Pierce Duggan. Boston: Atlantic Monthly Press.

PROF. JOHN BASSETT MOORE must have had a jolly time preparing his contribution to this symposium, and by the same token, Mr. Duggan must have been in somewhat of a quandary when he received his most distinguished contributor's lucubration. He could hardly turn it down, but the publication of it necessitated embodying in this last grand drive for the Covenant certain unsympathetic, not to say rebellious, elements. Let me quote some samples:

On a certain occasion John Bright . . . recalled Addison's story of the man who did a thriving business by selling pills which were said to be very good for the earthquake. . . . This story but illustrates the universal human tendency to be fascinated by mystery, and to indulge expectations of good in inverse ratio to actual knowledge of the professed agencies by which it is to be brought about.

To-day we witness a striking example of this primitive tendency. At every turn we are accosted with the inquiry, "Are you in favor of a League of Nations?" As this inquiry is made with evident seriousness, we must assume that those who make it are unconscious of the fact that an affirmative response would only betray the presence of another would-be purchaser of seismic pills" (p. 64).

It was occasionally suggested . . . that this object (the prevention of war) would be attained by an alliance between the United States and the Entente Powers. This conception rested upon the singular assumption that, if the United States had prior to 1914 formed an alliance with Great Britain, France, and Russia, nothing would have been done by other Powers to enlarge and consolidate the opposition (pp. 69-70).

Now, when we come to deal with the question whether a League of Nations is desirable, the answer necessarily must depend upon what the League contains and what it proposes to do. Just as an individual's freedom of action is constrained by any contract that he may make, so a nation's freedom of action is constrained by any league or alliance into which it may enter. Whether the sacrifice is desirable, or even justifiable, depends upon the nature of the object in view and the character of the engagement by which it is sought to be attained. Mere engagements, whether individual or national, are, as such, neither good nor bad (p. 72).

It by no means follows that, because preponderant force will end a war, it can be relied upon to insure peace. . . . In 1793 France, then threatened with a shortage of food, was confronted with practically a united Europe, with the world's greatest maritime Power at the head of the coalition. And yet, with the exception of the brief respite following the peace of Amiens, the war continued twenty-two years, and in the end France emerged from the conflict with her boundaries scarcely diminished" (p. 75).

Finally, as one step toward international peace, Professor Moore mentions the necessity of getting rid of "the delusion that one's own motives are always higher, purer, and more disinterested than those of other persons, to say nothing of the passion for uniformity that denies the right to be different" (p. 81).

Despite the repetition inevitable in a volume planned along the lines of this one, and also the considerable amount of matter which current discussion has pretty well winnowed of its freshness of interest, the student of the issues involved in the League of Nations will find several of the chapters here offered well worth his attention. In Chapter VII, entitled, International Administration, Mr. Francis B. Sayre successfully summarizes a previous study of his own dealing with this interesting and important topic. Incidentally he touches upon the much debated Article X of the Covenant, as follows:

If Article X is to mean more than empty words—if it is to be clothed with force and reality—some means must be had for promptly and authoritatively determining in each particular case whether or not specific and admitted acts have constituted an infringement of territorial integrity. This may prove an exceedingly difficult question, depending upon a determination of just what constitutes "political independence," what constitutes "aggression" against such "political independence," . . . and countless other serious problems (p. 133).

Apparently Mr. Sayre does not share the President's conviction that the meaning of Article X is "plain."

Valuable, too, is Professor Borchard's discussion (Chapter XI) of the Problem of Backward Areas and of Colonies. Of the mandatory system provided by Article XXII of the Covenant—a solution which he accepts with obvious reservations—he incisively remarks that it will furnish us "with one of the best conceivable tests of the sincerity and efficacy of a league of nations."

In his interesting chapter on the United States and the Policy of Isolation (Chapter XV), Mr. Henry F. Munro pays a notable tribute to the principle which has hitherto underlain our diplomacy and which he would now have us abandon. He concedes it four main achievements, "apart from the realization of its fundamental purpose—the preservation of the national sovereignty." These are first, "the development of a high standard of mentality;" second, "the American doctrine of recognition;" third, "the adoption of the Open-Door Policy in China," which "was in all probability ensured only because of the detachment of the United States from the alignment of European diplomacy;" last, "the Monroe Doctrine, which has kept from Latin America the dangers arising from diplomatic and military interventions. Undeniably," he adds, "an excellent record of genuine achievement." On the other hand, he charges against this policy our failure to intervene in behalf of Armenia, and to take our share in the suppression of the African slave trade. But we did take a share in the latter enterprise, and if an insufficient share, the fact was due to American views on the subject of impressment, rather than to the principle of isolation. Then as to Armenia, it certainly remains to be shown that we would have acted more effectively in her behalf had we been involved in the European system. Certainly the example of England in this respect hardly supports Mr. Munro's contention.

One or two more general criticisms may be added. There is altogether too much talk about the "interdependence of States," nowadays, without discrimination as to degrees of such "interdependence." Again, no consideration seems to have been given by any of the writers to the relation between the problem of a world league and that of maintaining democratic institutions on a grand scale, of keeping political parties representative on domestic issues, of developing a genuine European federation, and like matters. For discussions of these fundamental problems the reader must turn elsewhere, for instance, to that excellent little volume by Seton Watson, Alfred Zimmern and others, "The War and Democracy."

EDWARD S. CORWIN

MAIN CURRENTS OF SPANISH LITERATURE. By J. D. M. Ford. New York: Henry Holt and Company.

THIS book, by the Smith Professor of French and Spanish Languages in Harvard University, consists of eight lectures which were delivered in the winter of 1918 at the Lowell Institute in Boston. As the title indicates, each chapter discusses a particular phase of Spanish literature. The first two are devoted to the literary embodiments of Spain's heroic tradition, the epic and the ballad; the third to Cervantes; the fourth and fifth to the two great dramatists, Lope de Vega and Calderon; the sixth to lyric poetry; and the seventh to the novel. The eighth and last chapter is called "High Points of Spanish-American Literature."

It is hardly necessary to say, in view of Professor Ford's eminence as a Hispanist, that his book is scholarly. His mastery of his subject is especially noteworthy in the first two chapters, which contain a careful discussion of the origin and development of the epic and the ballad, a matter over which much ink has been spilt. Scholars are still divided into two camps, those who believe that heroic ballads antedated the epic poems of the Middle Ages, the latter being an elaboration of the former, and those who believe that there were no ballads until the epics disintegrated into the extant romances of the fifteenth and later centuries. It is an interesting and important question, for its solution would throw light on the origin of other mediaeval epics, such as the "Chanson de Roland" and the "Nibelungenlied," as well as on that of the "Iliad" and the "Odyssey." But it has not yet been definitely solved, and Professor Ford wisely refrains from taking sides, contenting himself with presenting the arguments which have been used in attempts to prove the one or the other theory. In this connection it may be added that the Professor Lang whom Professor Ford quotes so often as the champion of the view that ballads antedate epics, is Professor Henry R. Lang of Yale University, the well-known Hispanist: not, as a recent reviewer in the New York Times seems to think, Andrew Lang!

As has been said, it is not surprising that Professor Ford's book is scholarly. It is a pleasure to add that it possesses another merit not always to be found in the company of scholarship. It is throughout extremely readable. It is instructive and interesting at the same time. This is due not only to the fact that the author is master of a graceful style; he also has several habits of exposition which are extremely effective. One of these is his way of throwing light on Spanish literature by references to English literature; as when, for instance, he points out that the authoress Gomez de Avellaneda anticipated "Uncle Tom's Cabin" in one of her novels and Wallace's "Fair God" in another.

Again, he gives a clear idea of the metrical arrangement of the double octosyllabic line of the heroic ballads by quoting from "Hiawatha" and treating two of Longfellow's short lines as forming one. Such references to familiar books and poems will make his readers feel less like strangers in a strange land. With like effect he often takes occasion to recall the opinions of English authors in regard to Spanish literature. It is interesting to learn that Shelley liked the "Numancia" of Cervantes, that Fielding and Scott acknowledged the influence of the "Novelas Ejemplares," and that Poe, Bryant, and Longfellow admired the lyrics of Luis de Leon.

Professor Ford shows especial skill in his use of translations. There are a great many scattered through the book, and they are all happily chosen. Some of them, such as Longfellow's rendering of the "Coplas" of Jorga Manrique, or Bryant's translation of Heredia's "Hymn to Niagara," are well known to American readers. It is a pleasure to find that there are many other English translations of Spanish poems, not so well known, but hardly less charming. It is too bad, however, that Professor Ford did not take the opportunity to include, at the end of the chapter on lyric poetry, Masefield's beautiful translations of two of Bécquer's most striking poems, those which the English poet calls "They Closed Her Eyes" and "The Harp."

The last chapter of the book, called "High Points of Spanish-American Literature," is the only one which is not proof against criticism. It is disappointing not because of anything it says, but because of what it does not say. It is a good account of the past of Spanish-American literature, but tells us practically nothing about what is of much greater interest and importance, its present and its future. The sun of Spanish-American literature is but rising. It is only during the last quarter of a century that its writers have begun to show an individuality which can be called Spanish-American, and an initiative which forecasts a brilliant future. Professor Ford does no more than hint at these things. It is obvious that he feels compelled, for lack of space, to concentrate his attention on four "high points" of the nineteenth century: Olmedo, Bello, Heredia, and Andrade. But if a writer on Spanish-American literature feels that he can not do justice to the present as well as to the past, it is the past which should be sacrificed. It is unfortunate that all the space available should be given to writers who throw practically no light on Spanish-American literature of to-day and to-morrow, and that none is given to the discussion of the phenomenon of which the Chilean statesman and novelist Orrego Luco speaks in one of his recent books: "We Spanish-Americans have a marked family resemblance; we have ways of living and thinking entirely peculiar to ourselves, and which do not exist in the mother country. This is especially evident in regard to literary productions." Above all, it is disappointing to find no discussion of the "Modernistas," the school whose leaders were Dario and Neruo, who died but recently, and Chocano, who is to-day perhaps the most conspicuous figure in Spanish-American literature. Surely a school of poetry which is not only the first to be Spanish-American rather than Spanish, but which also has actually exerted an influence on Spanish poetry itself, deserves a place among the "high points" of Spanish-American literature.

It is clear, however, that these disappointing features of the last chapter of Professor Ford's book are far outweighed by the excellence of the seven chapters which constitute its major part. It is no exaggeration to say that the book will prove indispensable to all who are interested in Spanish literature.

FREDERICK BLISS LUQUIENS

THE POWERS AND AIMS OF WESTERN DEMOCRACY. By William Milligan Sloane. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

DEMOCRACY is a word of infelicitous origin to which the lapse of centuries has given an exalted meaning. No teacher of youth escapes importunate questioning as to what democracy implies and whither our pursuit of it is leading us. Professor Sloane during his long years of experience as an educator was impressed with the necessity of answering these questions by an appeal to the lessons of history, and the present volume is the result.

The initial chapters of the book are devoted to a survey of the democratic concept in its differing shades as it fought its way down the ages, its beginnings in antiquity, its almost total eclipse during the Middle Ages, its revival during the era of Puritanism in England, and its formal recognition in the New World during and after the American Revolution. Then follows a study of the philosophy of democracy, its formulas and terms, its aims and limitations, with two rather illuminating chapters on the relation of democracy to efficiency in the administration of public affairs.

At this point the author strikes off on a different tangent and discusses at considerable length the theory and facts of nationhood in its relation to society and the individual. Here again there is a good deal of historical summarization, much of it skilful and accurate, although at times the discussion of institutions and movements is so general that it ceases to be very informing. The relation of democracy to war and peace, which forms the concluding theme of the book, is doubtless the topic which will prove most interesting to the general run of readers. In these chapters the author weaves together into a relatively homogeneous narrative a great many scattered threads which the student of political science has hitherto had dangling loose before his eyes.

Professor Sloane is a staunch believer in the democratic form of government. He regards it as "the best form of human association thus far devised" and he calls upon the history of almost every country in the world to confirm his conviction on this point. Yet he is not unmindful of democracy's shortcomings, chief among which is its tendency to drift from its moorings and become the prey of class domination. This drifting, Dr. Sloane believes, is the most ominous portent which faces the American people to-day. It carries a threat to ourselves and to posterity.

In substance and in temper the volume does its author credit. It is the work of a man who has studied history with great thoroughness and whose mature reflections enable him to place many of to-day's hectic developments in their proper relation to the past. Here is one scholar, at least, who has not been stampeded by general unrest of our time. He finds comfort in the fact that at all transition periods in history there has been a temporary loss of balance with an inevitable shifting back to a stable basis. His book is not a plea for anything, therefore, unless it be for soberness of thought and eternal vigilance as the only means of keeping democracy secure.

WILLIAM BENNETT MUNRO

MR. WEALE is so well known as a writer upon Far Eastern affairs that a new book from his pen ("The Truth About China and Japan"; Dodd, Mead) is always welcome. In the present case, however, it is probable that readers will not find what they will expect from the title of the volume—a comprehensive statement of the relations between China and Japan and a discussion of the present situation in the light of Japan's position in Shantung. The book is a brief one, containing as it does scarcely thirty thousand words exclusive of appended documents, and is composed of three essays originally published in Asia. The first chapter, a third of the text proper, sheds some light upon the manner in which, in earlier years, Japan dealt with China and Korea, but throws little illumination upon present policies. The remaining chapters are interesting only as containing expressions of the personal opinions of the author. The last chapter is entitled "If Japan Refuses?" but the reader is left to guess what possible refusal Mr. Weale has in mind. One thing, however, is clear: Mr. Weale, in common with all other writers familiar with the whole Far Eastern situation, sees serious trouble ahead for the world, unless Japan voluntarily changes her international policies and methods, or is constrained by the other Powers to do so. "If there is justice enough left over after Europe has settled her own troubles, Eastern Asia is surely the first claimant. For unless that precious quality is used in abundance, the day is not far distant when the crash will come and men must fight again." With these words Mr. Weale closes his book.

In his "Secrets of Animal Life" (Holt) Prof. J. Arthur Thomson has taken forty scientific pamphlets or hooks, written for the most part in strictly technical language by as many leading men of science, and has translated them into unusually readable reviews or abstracts, removing what is recondite, and illuminating what is obscure. Typical captions are, The Cawing of Rooks, The Educability of a Snail, The Cult of Shells, The Fitness of Right Whales, The Curve of Life, With Darwin Forwards, and Before the Dawn of Art. Of the forty chapters, sixteen are based on the investigations of American scientists. Ten deal with individual species or small groups, six are general, ten more treat of development or behavior, and fourteen are concerned with evolutionary concepts and theories. A subtitle should certainly have been furnished, to indicate the peculiar value which this volume possesses. If a little more literary quality had been achieved by the author, this book would have taken high place in the year's reading for intelligent laymen.

Though the war caused the quarterly sections of the Oxford Dictionary to appear less regularly, their publication was not suspended and now that peace has come, lost time is being made up. Thus, two sections have recently arrived in this country simultaneously, forming over a hundred pages of volume nine. The magnitude of this lexicographical undertaking of the Clarendon Press is best brought out perhaps by comparing it with what has already been done in this same field. For instance, the number of words defined by Dr. Johnson in this portion of the alphabet—a part of the letter S—was 348, in Cassell 1878, and the Century 2365, whereas the Oxford treats 4676 words. Dr. Johnson was particularly proud of his illustrative quotations, and in the space covered by these two sections, he so presented 202 words, Cassell 478, Century 624, while the Oxford again stands first with 3625. In the number of illustrative quotations, the Oxford makes a still more wonderful showing, having 24,563, to 1,139 for Dr. Johnson, 972 for Cassell and 1,836 for the Century.

In the matter of definitions and etymologies these sections are also interesting. The facts concerning the origin of syllabus, here first shown to be derived from what we would call to-day a simple typographical error, are given in brief, but can be found in full in the London Times Literary Supplement of February of this year. Full references are given in the second of these sections to the literature of sweet singer,—this curiosity of sectarian nomenclature. The longest article in the first section is that on the verb strike,—twenty-nine columns. We are told that "the word presents an extraordinary diversity of meanings, the mutual relations of which cannot always be determined with certainty." One interesting point is that the use of strike in the sense of "to refuse to work," is "an eighteenth century development from the nautical use in 'to strike a mast.'" Stunt in the American college sense, though overlooked by the Century (1895) and Webster (1897), is given here, and straw vote and straw-ride both seem to be American inventions. The French meaning grafted on to symbolism and symbolist is here recorded. The illustrative quotation under strong-minded shows what progress the feminist movement has made since 1878, when Besant has one of his characters in "By Celia's Arbour" say: "They had not become strong-minded; they did not sit on School Boards or sigh for Female Suffrage."

So far we see no sign that the publication of the great Thesaurus Linguae Latinae is to be resumed.

The Financial Situation

THE slight increase of discount rates which went into effect early this month at the Federal Reserve banks was not in itself sufficient to cause all of the commotion which has followed in the money and stock markets. Borrowers do not stand on a half or three-quarters of one per cent. when they are using funds profitably, and with wage and price advances on every hand a moderate advance of interest rates would be accepted as a matter of course, provided there was no curtailment of accommodations. The new rates of themselves have not disturbed anybody; it was the fact that the Reserve Board had indicated its purpose to stop the further expansion of bank credit that put interest rates up and the stock market down.

It was time for the authorities to take this stand. On the 1st of November, 1918, this country was at war and straining all its productive forces to the limit. For more than a year and a half the Government had been in the money market as a heavy borrower. It was calling on the banks twice a month to take $500,000,000 of Treasury certificates. Industry and trade were at the highest stage of activity, and the total bill-holdings of the Federal Reserve banks were $2,123,019,000. On the corresponding date of 1919, October 31, nearly a year after the armistice, with Government disbursements down from $1,664,861,000 in October, 1918, to $576,348,000 in October, 1919, and its borrowings correspondingly reduced, the bill-holdings of the Federal Reserve banks aggregated $2,522,902,000. The percentage of reserves to net deposit and note liabilities a year ago was 49.8 and on November 7, 1919, it was 46.8. The total of loans and discounts of all national banks on June 30, 1914, was $6,430,000,000 and on June 30, 1919, $10,852,000,000, and in addition to the latter so much of the $2,122,000,000 of bills held by the Federal Reserve banks as was passed up to them by national banks—the greater part.

The Federal Reserve act requires that each reserve bank shall keep a cash reserve against its deposits of not less than 35 per cent. and against its outstanding note issues of not less than 40 per cent. The practice in computing reserves is either to calculate them against the combined deposits and note liabilities, or first allot the required 35 per cent. to deposits and then assign the remainder to the notes. On October 17 last, the reserve of the New York bank against the net combined liabilities was 37.5 per cent., and after allotting 35 per cent. to deposits the remainder equalled 39.9 per cent. of the notes outstanding, or slightly—less than the legal requirement. Moreover, there is reason to believe that the deficit would have been considerably larger if the Bank had not sold paper to other reserve banks.

The Federal Reserve Bulletin for October contains a calculation of the amount of war obligations of the Government held by all banks on June 30, 1919, including Liberty bonds, Victory notes, and Treasury certificates owned outright and held as collateral for loans. The total is $6,500,000,000. This amount of bank credit has been manufactured and put in circulation as purchasing power. The loans represent bonds purchased and not yet paid for, or loans made for other purposes and secured by the pledge of Government paper. In recent months there has been a tendency for this class of paper to increase, owing to the fact that it has enjoyed a preferred rate, established during the bond-selling campaigns to encourage subscriptions.

The Federal Reserve authorities have felt that owing to the encouragement given the public to borrow for the purpose of subscribing to the Fourth Liberty loan and the Victory loan they were estopped from raising the discount rates until one year had elapsed from the date of the former, but warnings have been repeatedly given that steps would be taken then to check further inflation.

It cannot be reasonably claimed that there was real necessity to use so much more bank credit in carrying on the business of the country in 1919 than was required in 1918 or in 1914. It is doubtful if the production of the country is any greater in 1919 than in 1918, and nobody would be so absurd as to suggest that it has doubled since 1914.

There are people, however, who say that the law of supply and demand should govern, and that wages and prices are higher than in 1918 and nearly double what they were in 1914. What is precisely the point upon which the issue turns? Most of us have a great deal of respect for the law of supply and demand, but behind that there are influences—psychological influences—affecting demand and supply, on which it is necessary to exercise some degree of control if inflation is not to run wild.

Everybody knew that inflation was going on during the war, but it seemed to be unavoidable. It seemed to be necessary, in order to get labor for the war industries, to make wages attractive enough to draw men from other work, and when the other industries in self-defence also raised wages a competition was begun which lifted the whole level of costs. It seemed to be necessary, in order to place the Government loans, to urge people to borrow of the banks in order to subscribe, and such is the common ignorance of economic principles that many people thought their duty was done when they lent the use of their names to the Government in this manner. They didn't see any necessity for paying these loans. They didn't see any reason why they should deny themselves personal pleasures or modify their business plans for the purpose of paying.

The problem and difficulty of war finance and the mystery of inflation have centered in the fact that the people fixed all their attention upon supplying the Government with purchasing power and gave no thought to supplying it with the tangible things that it wanted. They went cheerfully to the banks and gave their notes for the purchase of bonds, and then went into the market and bid against the Government for the goods and labor wanted. There was no increase of productive capacity commensurate with the increase of purchasing power in the form of bank credit.

We take credit to ourselves for avoiding the crude methods of the Civil War Administration, which printed greenbacks by the cartload and paid them out in settlement of expenses. How could anybody be so foolish as to think that a great war could be carried on at no cost except for the operation of printing presses? Anybody ought to see that there would be an inflation of the currency which would have to be eliminated eventually, and that these notes would have to be paid off and retired! Only very ignorant people are supposed to believe that it is possible to make something out of nothing even by Government fiat.

But what difference in principle or results is there between having the Government create credit and place it in circulation as purchasing power in the form of its own promissory notes, and having citizens create credit through the banks, by giving their own notes secured by Government bonds, and turning this credit over to the Government to put in circulation as purchasing power? Isn't the latter just another variation of the old effort to beat the inevitable, to give something and not part with it, and to carry on a war without cost or sacrifice?

Evidently there is something wrong with the theory that we need never redeem or cancel this vast body of credit called into use during the war. It was called out by our efforts to evade, or to compromise with, the stern economic demand that we should curtail our normal expenditures and divert our industrial energies to the war. If such efforts were successful they would show that there was a way to beat the economic law.

It may be said that they beat it in the Civil War period by refusing to retire the greenbacks. But they paid the penalty between the close of the war and the resumption of gold payments, January 1, 1879, and eventually $150,000,000 in gold was placed behind the $346,000,000 of greenbacks, not to speak of the hundreds of millions of bonds sold to replenish the reserve, and the cost of uncertainty and panics.

So deceptive is this use of credit that the increase of bank loans is even pointed to as evidence of a rapid growth of wealth during the war. Examine what occurs when a bank makes a loan of $10,000: The borrower takes credit for it in his account and the bank's deposits are increased $10,000. It is quite as simple as printing greenbacks. And when this depositor checks out the $10,000 his checks are deposited in other banks and this credit will continue to circulate as purchasing power until somebody actually earns and saves $10,000, and devotes it to paying off that loan. Then and not before is the wealth of the country increased in the sum of $10,000.

Prices are the result of the relation between the purchasing medium and the supply of commodities, and the volume of medium having been inflated without any corresponding increase in the volume of commodities, the price level naturally has risen. People talk helplessly about the need of more credit to handle an increasing volume of transactions, and helplessly about the rising prices. The remedy for both difficulties is in paying their debts, and reducing the use of credit to the scale of before the war.

It was stated last spring when the life-insurance companies were urged to lend large sums for building operations that the principal New York companies were owing $75,000,000 to banks for money borrowed for the purchase of Liberty bonds. Recently it has been said that these loans have been paid off, and this illustrates what the whole country should be doing. But the record shows that the credit which these insurance companies and others have released by their payments has been taken up and kept in circulation by new borrowers, and the volume of outstanding credit actually increased.

Where the credit released by all those who have reduced their indebtedness has gone is not difficult to surmise. There has been a great revival of enterprise and speculation. The New York Journal of Commerce, which keeps track of new companies, reports that in the first eight months of 1919 the capital started in these incorporations aggregated $5,948,000,000, against $1,989,000,000 in the corresponding months of 1918. There is an extensive revival of building operations, and a great activity in farming lands, the latter in some sections accompanied by an advance in prices which has tied up a good deal of credit. In Wall Street there has been a revival in the stock market with advancing prices.

We have come to the test of the power of the Federal Reserve system to contract or hold in check a state of inflation. Its elasticity in expansion has been demonstrated, but elasticity should have the power of contraction as well as expansion. It is not an easy task to contract the volume of credit in use, for the level of prices must be lowered, and it is highly desirable that this be done without an interruption of industry and trade.

Some people say it cannot be done without such interruption, but I am not going to discuss that here. I am simply going to point out that if the present price level is permanent the gold standard must be abandoned.

Most of the people who talk confidently about the permanency of the present price level do not seem to be thinking about the relation of prices to the standard of value. The unit of value in this country is 23.22 grains of fine gold. The term "dollar" is affixed by law to this amount of gold, but as a matter of fact commodity prices have become dissociated from the gold dollar. The purchasing power of the gold dollar has been diluted by the flood of credit dollars. But this is not a permanent situation. The mining of gold has become an unprofitable business and gold production is declining. The output in the United States has fallen from $101,035,000 in 1915 to $68,000,000 in 1918, and may not exceed $55,000,000 this year. World production fell from $470,466,214 in 1915 to $380,000,000 in 1918, and is falling lower this year. Moreover, the consumption of gold in jewelry and other manufactures is increasing rapidly. As a measure of economy, to prevent the melting of coin, the United States mint service sells small gold bars for the use of manufacturers of jewelry, dental supplies, gold leaf, etc., and the principal establishment handling this trade is the United States Assay office in New York. For the first ten months of 1913 the sales of such bars by the New York assay office for consumption in the United States aggregated $31,523,964 and for the first ten months of 1919 they aggregated $48,568,698. Including the sales at the Philadelphia mint and other offices of the mint service, and the melting of coin, which always goes on to some extent, the consumption of gold in the arts in the year 1919 probably will not fall much below $65,000,000. It will exceed production in this country, and the United States is one of the principal gold-producing countries of the world. Furthermore, with gold bringing only the mint price, and wages and all mining costs at the present level, gold production will continue to decline, and the industrial consumption will draw from year to year upon the gold stock in bank reserves.

The volume of bank credit must be kept within certain definite relations to the amount of gold in the bank reserves. The Federal Reserve Act specifies what the relation shall be in the case of the reserve banks, and the national banking act and various state banking laws lay down the requirements for other banks. The figures given above show how close the reserve banks are now to the limit of expansion, and the other banks are as close. The population of this country is growing, the volume of business is naturally increasing, and this means that an increasing amount of credit is normally required. It is evident, therefore, that unless the gold reserves are increased there will be a restriction of credit which will effect a relative reduction of the amount in use. So long as the balance of trade is in our favor we may have gold importations, but when the balance turns we are likely to have exportations. There is no escape from the conclusion that we are either going to have a restriction of bank credit within about the present limits, or we are going to cut loose from the gold standard.

There are always people who do not see any use for a standard, who argue vaguely that the banks cannot lend too much money so long as the collateral is good, the value of collateral being determined by the current price-level. They would have the ship steered by the light in its own foretop. Then there are people who want to change to some other standard, to alter the compass or adopt a new star. Some people will say that we are off the gold standard anyhow and might as well wash the slate and start anew. This would mean deliberately to scale down the entire body of outstanding indebtedness, including the Liberty bonds, which we have not yet ceased to acclaim as the most inviolable obligation and certain investment on earth. To change the standard of value in order to avoid reducing the war inflation would be the most gigantic exploitation of savings ever committed in the world. Charles the First's robbery of bank deposits and the old time expedient of debasing the coins would be only faint suggestions. There was inflation during the Civil War, and proposals were made to pay the bonds in greenbacks and never redeem the greenbacks, but the people rejected them all. The signs of the times are that all the fundamental principles of sound finance will have to be fought over again.

Forbes-Robertson and the "Lost Leader"

SIR JOHNSTON FORBES-ROBERTSON delivered, at the Broadhurst Theatre, on the afternoons of October 29, November 5, and November 12, three discourses (he denounces the word "lecture") on Shakespeare and his art, on the prose of Shakespeare, and on the Lear, Macbeth, Othello, Hamlet group. Many passages, sometimes entire scenes, were read or declaimed to an audience whose thirst for that vintage was unquenchable. "Readings" perhaps would have been a more diplomatic title than "lectures" or "discourses." As reader, Forbes-Robertson could not have been hurt by the spareness of his commentary; as lecturer, he is set back or put aside by the predominance of his readings. These readings traverse his discourses like powerful batteries crossing a fragile bridge; they reach the further bank in safety, but they leave the fabric rent or reeling.

One may guess that Forbes-Robertson has not lectured before, or practised letters long enough to know how closely the grace of informality is neighbored by the vice of formlessness. One may also infer that his own matter, which is partly critical, partly descriptive, partly anecdotal, has been loosely put together in the urgencies and stringencies of the final moment. In a lecture on Shakespeare's prose Forbes-Robertson is irresistibly moved to recite Mercutio's blank-verse speech on Queen Mab. This would not matter much if Forbes-Robertson were not so sure that it did matter, and did not so bestir himself and veer and shift in the effort to give it relevance as finally to convince us, to his own cost, that irrelevance is a wicked thing.

In the delivery of his lectures, which apparently he has not been at the pains to commit either to writing or memory, Forbes-Robertson shows both a certain embarrassment and a certain ease; one might say that he handles his embarrassment easily. The mind is slow, at least in the provision of words, and halts the temperament and the voice, both of which are rapid. I am reminded of a cavalry troop delayed in the natural swiftness of its course by the tardy arrival of indispensable supplies from a lagging commissariat. The amount of incidental nervous motion, the prompting or jogging of the mind by the body, was noticeably great, especially in the first lecture. I doubt if he lost anything by this restlessness; it bridged the interval between himself and his audience. Nothing charms us in a superior like his passing need of our indulgence.

It is difficult to imagine a more perfect control of a more exquisite voice than that displayed by Forbes-Robertson in his delivery of the Shakespearean extracts. In some points he stands nearly or quite alone. His transitions are miraculously plastic. Who else can so abridge a vocal curve without creating a vocal angle, or, in plainer words, who else can make the rise to force instantaneous without making it abrupt? There is another point in which his subtlety is marvelous. He can diminish indefinitely without blurring; his diamond type is cut like a diamond. All through his work, which seems a form of weaving, there is a sort of inter-play and counter-play, of shuttling back and forth, between the swift and the slow, the bass and the tenor, the hairline and the bold stroke, the conversational and the declamatory. In the last-named point he fell into an inconsistency which has interest if not significance. He thinks, rightly perhaps, that Hamlet's speech to the players should be uttered, metaphorically speaking, from the arm-chair, not the rostrum; and, on this conversational basis, he delivered the speech charmingly, only with a little curbing or chastisement of certain phrases that wanted to be declaimed and grumbled at his refusal. Later on, he gives the final lines of Jaques's "Ages of Man" speech in a very pleasing but highly declamatory manner. Now, when it is remembered that Hamlet is, after all, making a speech, and that Jaques is only beguiling the interval between dinner-time and dinner at a hunters' rustic meal in the artlessness of the unbookish forest, it is rather curious to see Forbes-Robertson presenting Jaques with the declamation which he has just denied to Hamlet.

I proceed to an acknowledgment which I make with some pain and a trace of diffidence. Even with his noble Hamlet still vivid in my grateful memory, I did not feel that Forbes-Robertson, in his renderings of the great Shakespearean characters in his lectures, often gave me the key of their souls. Instead, he kept me outside, contentedly lingering over the beauty of the sculptured portal. The exceptions, if momentous, were also momentary. A single gesture, for instance, in Hamlet's dying speech, before the solemn words "The rest is silence"—a gesture of outflung, deprecating hands which a Frenchman would have accompanied with a shrug and a "Que voulez-vous?"—found its way to a cell in my heart which had remained impenetrable to his elaboration of the terrors and poignancies of the midnight dialogue between Macbeth and his wife. I spoke just now of weaving; Forbes-Robertson matches tones like colors, but the real and beau-

Something must be said, finally, of the critical opinions which are scattered rather sparsely through these lectures. On the sanity of Hamlet—one of the touchstones of sanity in critics—Forbes-Robertson is unreservedly on the right, or sane, side. He approves of the epithet, "impish," in relation to Hamlet. This is partly acute, partly mistaken; Hamlet is antic as surely as Iago is bad, but I shall call Hamlet impish only when I call Iago naughty. Forbes-Robertson thinks that Hamlet talks like a man of forty; the men of forty should be jubilant. He discovers a resemblance between Macbeth and Hamlet, a happy insight which he largely justifies by pointing to their kinship as poets, declaimers, hesitators. These are some of the better opinions; Forbes-Robertson's mind might be described, on the whole, as sketchy. Personally I should have thanked the honored artist if he had forborne to corroborate my suspicion that the intellectual reserves behind intellectual acting are small. This is no ground for the withdrawal of homage. To be an agreeable gentleman and a distinguished artist is to have paid one's score royally in this queer little inn or post-house of a world in which most of us have by comparison bilked our reckoning. It may be said that where we cannot pay to so high a benefactor the honor of praise, we should grant him the respect of silence. To which it might be replied that possibly Sir Johnston Forbes-Robertson owed to his own reputation the tribute of that delicate respect.

I saw on November 13 the "Lost Leader," the Parnell play by Mr. Lennox Robinson, acted at the Greenwich Village Theatre, with Mr. Frank Conroy in the major part. As my own rating of this play does not differ materially from Mr. William Archer's lucid estimate of the English presentation in the Review for July 26, I shall confine my observations pretty closely to the performance. Mr. Frank Conroy's portrayal of the hero was skilful, if you grant him his Lucius or Parnell. I, for one, was unwilling to make that grant. Mr. Conroy's Lucius is a union of peasant and prophet, with patriarch as the copula. I found that he ceased to be dreary only to become august, and I had no room for either the dreary or the august in my not too definite recollections of Charles Stuart Parnell. In the first act the character revealed a desolation which in a humble person would have inspired pity coupled with an arrogance or some such quality which in a fortunate man would have excited revolt. The revolt and pity met in my heart and canceled each other. This sounds a little fine-spun, as I write it down, and it is only fair to Mr. Conroy's impersonation to add that an audience, Hibernian enough to know something of Parnell, gave no hint of any participation in my unrest. In the third act I myself found in his eloquence a depth and fervency which would have impressed me in another part or a different play. But here Mr. Robinson maliciously interposed between me and my growing, or at least germinating, appreciation of Mr. Conroy. Parnell, called upon for explanations, explains in the airiest and the rosiest vein, unfolding to Irishmen on the eve of civil outbreak, a programme which Shelley would have found too evanescent for his "Revolt of Islam" and Sir Thomas More too abstract for his Utopia.

The Industrial Problem

A READER of the Review, wishing to stimulate clear thinking on the industrial problem, is trying to collect a dozen or fifteen books to that end. He names, as essential, "Glenn Frank's book on 'The Politics of Industry,' Professor John R. Commons's 'History of Labor,' William L. M. King's 'Industry and Humanity,' Alfred E. Zimmern's 'Nationality and Government,' and F. S. Marvin's 'Progress and History.'

He asks the Review for additional titles. It may be said, first, that books on the specific subject of strikes were named in an article printed in this department on September 6. But for the broader subject of the industrial problem here are some suggestions for the reader of to-day: John A. Hobson's "Work and Wealth" (Macmillan, 1914) and Carl H. Mote's "Industrial Arbitration" (Bobbs, 1916). Then there is John R. Commons's "Industrial Good-Will" (McGraw, 1919), which has been commended for managers of plants as well as for students. Sydney J. Chapman is the editor of a symposium by English writers, called "Labour and Capital after the War" (Macmillan, 1919), while "Mediation, Investigation and Arbitration in Industrial Disputes" (Appleton, 1916), by George E. Barnett and David McCabe, and a volume by the Secretary of Commerce, William C. Redfield, "The New Industrial Day; a Book for Men Who Employ Men" (Century, 1912) are also indicated.

"Management and Men" (Century, 1919) by Meyer Bloomfield, is a comprehensive view of English industrial relations, with an appendix containing many important documents bearing on current affairs in Great Britain. Sydney J. Chapman's "Work and Wages. Part III. Social Betterment" (Longmans, 1915) is one of the series in continuation of Earl Brassey's "Work and Wages." John Leitch is the author of a work called "Man to Man; the Story of Industrial Democracy" (Forbes, 1919), while Fred H. Colvin, in "Labor Turnover, Loyalty and Output" (McGraw, 1919) attempts to give the workingman's views.

Let the Country Speak!

THE Senate's rejection of the treaty of peace was the result of a long series of unfortunate developments. It did not express the Senate's judgment on the central issue. It does not mean that the Senate wishes to kill the treaty. On the contrary, 80 Senators out of 96 stand clearly recorded in favor of the treaty, the only difference between them being as to the precise character of the reservations.

Nevertheless, the treaty is, for the time being, dead. There is the gravest danger that, through a recurrence of the same kind of game of cross-purposes that we have so long been witnessing, it may be killed beyond the possibility of resurrection. The surest way to prevent this calamity is for public opinion to assert itself in such a manner that its voice shall be unmistakable.

Hitherto, this has been made almost impossible by the confusion and complexity of the situation. The situation is now extremely simple. Practically nobody is asking for amendments that would be tantamount to rejection of the treaty; practically nobody is asking for acceptance of the treaty without substantial reservations. The difference between the Lodge reservations and a set of reservations that would unquestionably be accepted by the great bulk of the Democratic Senators is small. To bridge over this difference will require only a reasonable manifestation of good will and good sense, and the nation has a right to demand that it be done.

It is the glory of our country to have brought to a triumphant close the gigantic war for the rescue of the world from the German peril. But the fruits of that victory are not secure. Hard terms have been imposed upon Germany, but it will be years before they are fulfilled. In the meanwhile, the world is in an ominous state of upheaval and disturbance. To prevent Germany's defeat from being turned into victory, and to protect the world—including our own country—against the danger of appalling unrest and disaster, a strong concert of nations is essential. To make this concert truly effective, it is essential that our own country—the richest and most powerful, the most fortunate and the most trusted of nations—shall bear her share.

What is at stake, therefore, in the United States Senate is not the realization of a dream of perfection, or of everlasting peace, but the immediate safety and welfare of the world. There might have been other ways of providing for our cooperation to this end; as a matter of fact, there is manifestly now only one. If we are to do our duty to ourselves and to the world, we must ratify this treaty, and no other. The Senate has almost unanimously declared its desire to serve this great end; it has split only upon what, in comparison with it, are insignificant details.

If the sentiment of the country were brought to bear on the situation, the result, we are sure, would not remain for a moment in doubt. Let the people of every great community say to the Senate when it reassembles:

"Senators of the United States—we citizens appeal to each one of you to lay aside all questions of party attachment or personal difference and to unite in overcoming the minor difficulty that yet stands in the way of the great consummation."

VERY few as yet fully realize what we owe to the anti-submarine operations of the British and American navies. Upon our regular channel of communication with France and England not one disastrous submarine raid was executed. So carefully was this pathway protected that in proportion to the numbers crossing, the loss of life during the period of our war operations was less than would normally have resulted a generation ago from the ordinary perils of sea travel in time of peace. In these days, when reckless individuals and interests are doing what they can to arouse ill feeling against England, we must not forget that of the millions of Americans who had to cross the Atlantic on account of the war, a large number would never have seen their home shores again but for the aid of the British navy.

THE "freedom of the seas" from the terror of the marauding submarine, during the war, necessitated the sowing of a large part of the North Sea with many thousands of deadly mines, for the destruction of the under-seas craft as they attempted to emerge from the German harbors. There is no question that thousands of lives and a very large number of supply-laden vessels were saved to the Allies and to neutrals by these mines. The North River at New York was enlivened on Sunday by the arrival of fifty-nine mine sweepers, the crews of which have spent a large portion of the past year in removing the mines and clearing the North Sea once more for the traffic of peace. More than 50,000 mines were lifted. The danger of the work is indicated by the fact that in the British navy only volunteers are so employed, and a bonus in pay is allowed. The work was so carefully done by our men, however, that only one of our mine sweepers was destroyed in the process. The reception and other honors tendered to the returning crews on Monday were abundantly deserved.

WILLIAM J. BRYAN, a few days ago, gave out the following statement and question: "Press dispatches report bullion value of gold dollar five cents less than bullion value of silver dollar. Are the New York financiers living up to their claims of honesty that they made so vociferously in 1896? Or are they paying their debts in a cheap gold dollar?" They are both paying their debts, and receiving the amounts due to them, in the same dollar that was the standard when both classes of obligations were contracted. If they are distinctly creditors rather than debtors, as Mr. Bryan has always assumed, the cheap gold dollar is not a source of gain, but of enormous loss, to them. But they are opposed to an arbitrary change in the standard now, in the supposed interest of a class, as they were opposed to it then, not for mere selfish reasons but because they saw in any such change a sure injury to all classes. And on this point, the judgment of the people was with them then, as it is with them now. Has a quarter of a century been insufficient to clear the fog from Mr. Bryan's brain in this matter?

THROUGH the gloom of the treaty situation, a unique ray of light comes from the New York Evening Sun. If peace cannot come in the usual way, the Evening Sun's suggestion, which is apparently made without the slightest intention to be funny, is that Congress shall proceed "to reconsider the resolution by which it declared a state of war to exist, and lay the same on the table or kill it by a negative vote." Congress having thus revoked its decision that a state of war existed in 1917, it will of course not exist now. So wholly original a line of constitutional construction of the powers of Congress suggests interesting possibilities of development. Such action once taken, the status of the matter would be that war does not exist now by virtue of not having existed then, and it would seem to follow that not having existed then, and not existing now, it never existed at all. In that case, the billions spent on a merely imaginary war could have brought no value in return, and it would seem to be the duty of the Department of Justice to proceed to recover from Secretary Baker and others through whom these sums were disbursed. Again, this Congressional reconsideration of the war out of existence would seem to disprove all those reported losses of life in battle. Of course this seems difficult to reconcile with certain hard facts; but perhaps when Emerson wrote those cryptic words, "If the red slayer think he slays, Or if the slain think he is slain, They know not well the subtle ways," etc., he had a prevision of the Evening Sun's new discovery of a way by which Father Time can whirl his scythe back of him and snip off at its very sprouting the thorn tree of war which seemed to our dull senses to have grown to maturity. There are many other lines of speculation opened up by the Evening Sun's discovery, among them the Kaiser's apparent ethical right to resume his throne if Congress shall by reconsideration annul that part of the world war which was chiefly responsible for his present residence in Holland in private station. But we forbear; "It is a great matter, and requires further deliberation," as Demipho's legal adviser says in the Phormio of Terence.

MR. CRAM'S suggestion of an embargo on talk is not wholly fanciful. In South Dakota delegates to the Presidential convention are required to file a statement of the issues on which they aspire to be elected, consisting of not more than eight words. This is only a beginning, but it is pointed in the right direction. It is not easier to say nothing in a sort of combination epigram and telegram of eight words than in undammed floods of speech and ink, but with a little effort it is possible to say it more effectively. A rule to apply closure to the cheering at national conventions is now in order.

WHILE the Senate has been busy Americanizing the treaty, Congress as a whole has done painfully little to forward the work of Americanizing America. "Undesirables" are rounded up by the hundred and herded to New York, where they fall into the hands of the Immigration Bureau. The hands of the Bureau seem tied; whether through kindness, lack of funds, or the absence of needed authority the public does not know. It only knows that while a very few of its enemies are sent back to Europe most of them remain to plague us with aggravated violence. Just enough is done to lend a touch of reality to the grievances which are food and drink to the agitator, just enough is done to enrage his "intellectual" supporters, themselves apparently immune to the danger but keenly responsive to the excitement; and little or nothing is done to protect the public. Whatever the right course may be, that so far pursued is clearly wrong. If the right to conspire for the destruction of democracy as expressed in the institutions of America is to be abridged at all it must be done effectively; if not effectively, then better not at all. Either of these courses would find supporters; a course of uncertainty and paltering distresses everybody to no purpose.

D'ANNUNZIO is reported to be planning an overthrow of the dynasty. The poet's mind in a fine frenzy rolling is capable of the maddest acts when he begins to translate the flights of his fancy into politics. His descent upon Fiume, says the Journal des Débats, is now generally admitted to have been an attempt to force the Nitti Government to resign, after which the militarists, as whose willing tool he is acting, would have taken the control of the country in hand. But neither the wave of enthusiasm that followed his coup nor the recent elections have furthered these chauvinistic plans. Disappointment over the little satisfaction the electorate has given him may have egged him on to his latest challenge of the Government. By exposing the helplessness of the Cabinet he can, indeed, lower the prestige of Signor Nitti and his colleagues, and if that is his chief object there is some sense in his Dalmatian Quixotry. But what could he and his party gain by an overthrow of the dynasty? He lacks the power to establish in its stead the autocracy that would satisfy the militaristic clique, though it would cost him but little to set the revolution in motion. The Socialists would be the first to lend him a helping hand, and, when the work of destruction was accomplished, to rob him of its coveted fruits. D'Annunzio scheming revolution would be like the peasant blowing hot and cold, aiming at military dictatorship and bringing in that of the proletariat.

ANTICIPATING the defeat of Bolshevism at the polls, l'Europe Nouvelle saw no reason to grow enthusiastic at the prospect. "The results may be excellent in appearance for the elements of moderation and conservatism, but in reality they will be deplorable from the parliamentary point of view." The paper foresaw a political débacle because the bloc national, if it won the elections, would only form a mock majority, badly cemented and lacking that cohesion which only a loyal accord on the solution of the economic and financial problem could furnish. On the readjustment of the financial balance depends the reconstruction of the country. Five milliards of new resources must be found, says the optimist M. Klotz, Minister of Finance. Nine milliards, at the least, are needed according to the financial expert André Lefèvre. And the parties constituting the majority have not yet agreed on a positive programme of taxation that will keep their representatives united in the fulfillment of their legislative task. Unless they succeed, at the eleventh hour, in drawing up a programme of constructive policy, they will have exorcised the communist spectre for the time being only. But the French, in the recent crisis, have evinced an amount of common sense which may be taken as an augury that they will not fail, in the hour of victory, to attend to the warning voice of cool judgment.

YALE'S long heralded increase in the salaries of her professors proves a little disappointing. An addition of five hundred dollars to the two-thousand or twenty-five-hundred dollar salary of an assistant professor does not restore him even to the position of affluence that he enjoyed before the war. An advance of one thousand dollars in the salaries of full professors over the former levels of four and five thousand dollars is somewhat better, especially since it is coupled with a sort of promise that men of exceptional ability may now and then hope for a reward somewhat above the average. It is well to have it recognized as desirable that academic life, like the other professions, should offer a few material prizes to be striven for. With Harvard well over the ten million mark, with Princeton and Cornell actively in the field for augmenting their resources, with the State Universities, as always, in a position to meet the market, the academic horizon may be said to be brightening. It is not yet dawn, but there is promise of a new day which the other universities and colleges must contrive as they can to greet. Perhaps, for strict economy, there are too many colleges. Undoubtedly, for the best results, there are too many college teachers.

AT the recent annual convention in St. Louis the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union overwhelmingly voted down a resolution looking toward state legislation and even a Constitutional amendment prohibiting the use of tobacco. It cannot, however, have been an easy decision to arrive at. In the present state of both the legislative and the public mind very substantial successes in an anti-tobacco crusade might be counted on, and complete success would be a dream not impossible of realization. But the extending of the lines necessary for even a partial success throws at once into jeopardy the gain already made in the achievement of prohibition, a gain which still remains to be consolidated. Therefore a policy of slow and sure carries the convention. In future any suggestion that a programme of legislation is in contemplation can be set down as malicious propaganda on the part of baffled and enraged "wets"; on the part, too, of the Tobacco Trust, which, as everybody knows, seduces the people into using tobacco, just as the Clothes Trust lures them into the pernicious habit of wearing clothes, and the Furniture Trust betrays them into the vice of putting furniture into their houses. While the W. C. T. U. is educating the people along these and other lines, it is not too soon for the people to begin educating their representatives. Of the many ways the matter might be put to them, we limit ourselves to one which has something of the logical perfection of the syllogism, Why is tobacco bad? Everybody knows: Because "smoking leads to drinking." But the evil of drink has been removed. Therefore, a distracted humanity might safely be left to seek such solace as it may hope to find amid clouds of its own compelling.

PROPORTIONAL representation has much to recommend it if every citizen understands the use of his right to be his duty. But if the majority of the electorate, as happened in Italy last week, stays away from the polls the results cannot furnish a true reflection of the people's political opinions. There is only one means of preventing this indifference from invalidating the benefits of the system, and that is to make the vote obligatory. The Dutch Government, when it introduced proportional representation two years ago, coupled with it the principle of the compulsion to vote. But this cure for political apathy can only be effective if the machinery of the law works sufficiently quickly and efficiently to inflict speedy punishment on every shirker, as otherwise the law becomes the laughing-stock of the country.

THE centrifugal forces of the war have in most European countries proved detrimental to liberalism. The radical elements of the old liberal parties have drifted towards socialism, and the right wing, in self-defence against the growth of radical thought in its midst, has reacted by moving back to more conservative ideas. The political constellation has thereby assumed a simpler aspect: it is dominated by the two parties that are strong by internal discipline and extreme orthodoxy; the Socialists and the Roman Catholics. And the country's policy will be decided in one or the other way by the minor groups of various political

BY the conflict between these two international organizations, the Roman Catholic Church and the Socialist Internationale, the destinies of Europe will, for a long time to come, be dominated. The Church has the better chances of the two, so long as Socialism hesitates to take a decided stand against the tenets of Bolshevism. To the members of the third Internationale of Moscow, love of country is one of those fictions which capitalism keeps alive to serve its own selfish ends. Its internationalism seeks to build on the foundations of anti-nationalism, and to this the majority in every single country, however radical its tendencies may be, is bitterly opposed. "The French bourgeoisie has often shown great personal intelligence and activity, but it has lacked collective intelligence, it has neglected to play its part as a class." This verdict of Alfred Capus was published in Figaro about a month before the elections of November 16 were to put in question the justice of the charge. The bourgeoisie of France has had the collective intelligence to unite against the anti-national danger. The situation here was different from that in Italy and Belgium, since the Roman Catholics in France are not organized as a political force. But the people accepted the challenge of the international proletariat and played its part as a class with true Gallic verve. Socialism under the leadership of Jaurès could never have challenged the French bourgeoisie thus. Jaurès was a great writer and a great orator, and these are gifts which make a man popular in France, whatever his political ideas. But above all Jaurès belonged to France, not to his party only, and his internationalism was founded on the belief that in the brotherhood of men of which he dreamt French culture would take the lead and fulfill its high vocation. There was more unity of purpose between Jaurès and Clémenceau, the old radical, than there could be between the former Socialist leader and Longuet. Between men who love their own country best all political differences vanish when that which is dearest to them is at stake. The Church shows its wisdom in respecting the individual Catholic's love of country. And the "Anti-nationale" of Moscow defeats its own ends by despising a feeling firmly rooted in the people's mind. Tennyson, in his "Hands All Round," expressed what the masses unconsciously feel to be the truth:

That man's the best cosmopolite
Who loves his native country best.

The Chief Cause of High Prices

MR. GEORGE E. ROBERTS closed his trenchant article on "The Financial Situation," in last week's Review, with this sentence: "The signs of the times are that all the fundamental principles of sound finance will have to be fought over again."

There has been little difference of opinion among competent men as to the chief cause of high prices. But the natural tendency of the average man is to lay the blame for his troubles upon some person whom he can hold guilty, or upon some thing that is thrust on his immediate observation; and unfortunately this tendency has been but little corrected, and indeed has been in many ways stimulated, by the utterances and the acts of persons high in authority.

To this statement one highly important exception must, indeed, be made. The essential connection between high prices on the one hand and low productivity and wasteful consumption on the other has been insistently pointed out by our leading public men, as well as by those of other countries. "Work and save"—that maxim, if it has not been adequately followed by our people, has certainly been adequately preached to them. Nothing could be better than this teaching; and, so far as the practice of individuals in their daily lives is concerned, there is little that could be added to it. But it falls far short of spreading a just view of the cause of the trouble; and furthermore causes which have played but an insignificant part have been given a most misleading prominence.

The two most important examples of this are the hue and cry about speculative hoarding of necessities, and the reckless exploitation of the charge of "profiteering." As regards the former, some recent experiences are highly illuminating. A frantic search was made some months ago for concealed stores of sugar and of eggs, and the owners of these stores were compelled to put them on the market. These proceedings may have been entirely proper; but by no possibility did they have any perceptible beneficial effect upon the high-price difficulty. Eggs and sugar have both risen in price since; and the one thing certain is that those particular lots of eggs and of sugar are not now in existence, and therefore cannot by any possibility ease the present situation, which possibly they might have done if they had not been forced on the market two months ago. Furthermore, the quantities involved in these seizures, while represented in figures absolutely large, were relatively insignificant. Thus the whole amount of the sugar forced out of hiding was, at the last accounts we noticed, about five million pounds, while the shortage of supply with which the country is now grappling runs up high into the hundreds of millions. As an influence upon prices, storage for profit has played but a small part—and in all probability such part as it has played has been beneficial rather than injurious, since such storage is based on intelligent calculation of present and prospective demand. Hoarding for private use is another matter; since the motive for this is solely the desire for personal comfort or advantage, guided by no expert calculation of market prospects, it is conceivable that a great aggregate of supplies might be withdrawn from use at the very time when it was most desirable to have them available.

The case of "profiteering" is less simple. To begin with, the meaning of the word is vague in the extreme. If, for example, a given producer, who has the advantage of superior facilities, resources, or ability, charges for his product precisely the same price as other producers have to charge in order to be able to go on with their business, his profits are of course very much greater than the average; does this make him a "profiteer"? Most fair minded persons, with the case thus plainly stated, will say no; yet probably the greater part of the charges of profiteering that have any basis at all arise out of just such cases. But whatever the meaning of the term, profiteering, while it may have taken place on a grand scale as a consequence of high prices, has been but in a very minor degree the cause of them.

A most interesting and important bit of statistics bearing on the subject is contained in an address delivered at New Haven last week by Professor Melvin T. Copeland, director of the Bureau of Business Research of Harvard University. On the basis of accurate reports in the business of 197 retail grocery stores located in all parts of the United States, and "fully typical" of retail grocery stores generally, Professor Copeland finds the following state of facts:

The average cost of doing business in these retail grocery stores in 1918 was 14 per cent. of net sales. This figure for total expense included rent, whether the store was owned or leased, proprietor's salary, and interest both on owned and borrowed capital. The average gross profit in these stores was 16.9 per cent.; the average net profit was 2.3 per cent. of net sales. The highest figure for net profit that was shown by any of the reports received was 9.29 per cent. On the other hand, a number of stores showed a loss, the highest net loss being 6.5 per cent. of net sales.

From this it may be concluded, with something closely approaching certainty, that retail "profiteering" has played but a negligible part in bringing about the

It is to the inflation of the monetary medium that Prof. Copeland, like substantially every competent authority, chiefly ascribes the rise of prices. From 1900 to 1914, the amount of currency in circulation in this country had been "expanding at the rate of about $100,000,000 a year, due to the increase in the world's output of gold," and in consequence of even this degree of expansion "prices were constantly rising." But from 1914 to 1919 "the amount of currency in circulation in this country increased by $2,440,000,000"; that is, the "currency in circulation has increased 71 per cent. in the last five years." "There have been other contributing influences to cause high prices," says Prof. Copeland, "but this inflation of our currency is unquestionably the greatest factor." Expansion of credit was doubtless meant to be included, though not explicitly covered by these words. The point is that the tremendous enlargement of the monetary medium—whatever its form, whether gold, circulating notes, or bank credits transferable by check—is incomparably the most potent cause of the prevailing high prices. And Prof. Copeland hopes, as do others, that the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks have at last inaugurated a policy directed towards deflation.

Just what course can safely be pursued to promote this object is a question upon which only the most highly qualified experts are competent to pass. But it is of the first importance that the vital character of the object itself shall be realized by the public at large, and especially by the leaders in business, in politics, and in the ranks of labor. To follow false scents in such a matter as this is not only a deplorable waste of energy; it does incalculable mischief. The mere raising of hopes that cannot be fulfilled is itself a great evil, for exasperation intensified by disappointment is likely to lead to rash and mischievous action. But the most serious harm that is done by following one will-o'-the-wisp after another in the hunt for a remedy for high prices is that it keeps public attention directed away from the one cause which transcends all others. Whatever possibilities there may be for instituting a policy of deflation, there is little hope that such a policy will be vigorously pursued and persistently maintained unless there stands behind it a strong public opinion, or at least a strong sentiment among those who have, in such questions, a powerful influence upon public opinion. The first requisite for any possibility of real progress in grappling with the high-price problem is a clear recognition that the chief cause of high prices is the enormous expansion of the monetary medium.

The New Labor Conference

THERE is more than one vital difference between the conference on industrial conditions that is about to assemble in Washington and the conference which ended in hopeless failure a month ago. The difference in organization is obvious; the members are not labeled as representing any particular element in the case—either labor, capital or the public. But the significance of this feature, if the conference is to be more successful than its predecessor, must be understood as going far beyond its immediate implication. On the face of it, the meaning is that each member is supposed to say and do what he himself thinks best and wisest. What President Wilson stated in his Labor Day announcement of the first conference was that he would bring about a conference of "authoritative representatives of labor and of those who direct labor"; and the outcome was a tug-of-war between the forces thus represented, culminating in deadlock and the break-up of the conference. Upon this particular rock the new conference will not split. But merely to avoid this danger is to go but a very little way toward assuring a valuable result. Indeed, taken in itself, the absence of representative character in the conference is a loss, not a gain; the gain can only come through something else of real power and import taking the place of what has been removed.

That something else can be nothing else than brain-power. Agreements, concessions, compromises—these things may be arrived at simply as the result of the interplay of contending forces. But this coming conference will be in no position to effect agreements or arrange concessions or compromises. It will either have to do a lot of hard thinking, or set in motion a lot of hard thinking to be done by other persons, specially chosen on account of their fitness for the task. In either case, it is upon the quality of brain that is to be found in the membership of the conference that the issue of success or failure will depend. This does not necessarily imply that it is essential that all the members shall come up to a high standard in this regard. But it is essential that there be a sufficient infusion of men having high mental power, together with capacity for leadership, to insure effective guidance for the work of the conference as a whole. Mere good intentions will go but a very little way. Whether the requisite combination of brain-power and capacity for leadership are to be found in the membership of the conference remains to be seen.

But there is another vital point of difference, hardly second in importance to this. The first conference was assembled with a view to obtaining immediate results, results that could be promptly applied to the relief of the grave situation with which the nation was contending. In Mr. Wilson's Labor Day announcement, the proposed conference was coupled with the measures that had been initiated by the Government to reduce the cost of living, both being held out as reasons why the discontented should not aggressively press their grievances until time had been given for these remedial measures to show their efficacy. Nothing of the kind is referred to in the present call. The conference is not expected, says the President, to "deal directly with any condition which exists to-day," but his hope is that it "may lay the foundation for the development of standards and machinery within our industries" which will result in justice and fair dealing in the conduct of our industries, encouragement to both workingmen and employers, and benefit to the general public. To do anything substantial toward the attainment of these ends is at best a difficult task, as all know now a little better than they did before the recent conference met. But in buckling down to their problem the new gathering will have an inestimable advantage over the old one in the circumstance that they are not expected to hand out a solution "while you wait."

The Farmer's Profit

THERE are very widely separated angles from which the question of the farmer's prosperity may be viewed. If you remind him that you are paying over seventeen cents per quart for his milk, he will quickly remind you that only about two-fifths of that sum gets back as far as the railway station to which he must deliver the milk. Talk to him of eggs at eighty-seven cents a dozen and chickens (minus only the feathers, and not quite all of them) at forty-five cents a pound, and he tells you first that a large part of this has never acquired the "back to the farm" tendency, and secondly that the chickens must be fed on grain worth over two dollars a bushel. Allege that he himself is raising this high-priced grain, and he demurs that the profit is eaten out of it by the exorbitant cost of fertilizers, agricultural machinery, and farm labor. Switch over to the fancy prices which the products of his orchards are bringing on the fruit stands, and he retorts that winter killing, late frosts, and the prohibitive price of chemicals and apparatus for spraying have left him only an inconsiderable residue of the small amount which the commission merchants have seen fit to return to him on his fruit account. He would really feel tempted to cut the trees down, but for the outrageously high price of an axe. Talk of his automobile, and he may intimate that this is a matter of his wife's desires, not of his own financial resources.

And yet there is ample evidence that recent years have seen a substantial improvement in the financial position of the American farmer. The mortgage that represents the farmer's simple inability to keep his farm going and support his family out of its products is far less common to-day than thirty or twenty years ago. The bank records of country towns tell a story of farmers' accumulations in very pleasing contrast with anything that could have been shown then. The Liberty bonds in their safe-deposit boxes run into the hundreds of millions. Better methods of tillage, improved varieties of grain, fruit and live-stock, better roads, a wider diffusion of the results of agricultural research, a more general interest in agricultural education, have all contributed to the financial improvement of the farmer's position.

The fairly prosperous farmer, looking upon his farm as a home rather more than as a mere money-making investment, is an element so steady to the state, as well as so necessary, that no thoughtful person can begrudge him a handsome profit for his labor. There is room for such a profit without the consequence of an unendurable cost of living for the non-agricultural consumer. By the elimination of uneconomic methods of transportation and distribution much may be done to diminish the margin between the farmer's return and the consumer's expenditure. And there is another large resource for the improvement of the farmer's profits, without raising prices to the consumer, in improved methods of farming, which will increase the output per acre and at the same time reduce the unit cost of production. Every indication is that agricultural science, applied by intelligent and educated farmers, has not reached the limit in this line of progress, but is only getting fairly started.

On the whole, the farmer deserves congratulations. If he wants any really great wealth he must go elsewhere than to his farm for it; but for the renunciation of great material wealth there are many compensating advantages today, as in Horace's time, to him "who free from public cares, his own ancestral acres tills," not "with his own oxen," as in Horace's day, and with far too many of Horace's people in the Italy of our own day, but with his quick-stepping and well-bred farm horses, and agricultural machinery little less than human in its handiness. He will complain today, as he complained in Horace's time two thousand years ago, sometimes with good reason, sometimes from mere habit, and often as the welling up of a sly humor which his city cousins are not always quick-witted enough to detect and appreciate as it is intended. But however he strikes us we must all cry, Long live the farmer! For certainly the rest of us cannot live long without him.

“Not Just Yet”

THE woman who fills her husband's tears with constant assertions that she has no thought of buying an expensive silk gown just yet is not as negative in purpose as in words. She is merely seeking to establish in his sub-conscious mind the fatalistic impression that some time or other the gown must surely come.

Professor Thorstein Veblen has been toying for years with the idea of a new gown for our modern Goddess of Liberty. By this time he has passed far beyond the stage of suggesting that the old gown is badly worn. Repairs may be attempted, may hide the nakedness of our civilization temporarily from eyes not yet wide enough open to see, but sooner or later the garment is sure to fall in pieces, and something structurally different, from head to foot, must take its place. In a series of articles in the Dial, delayed a little but now again in progress, he enters vigorously into the “not just yet” stage of the campaign. The general tone of these articles is well illustrated by the following words from the first of them, in which we have employed italics to call attention to certain phrases that get their emphasis in the original precisely from the fact that they are slipped in so constantly without emphasis:

The Guardians of the Vested Interests in America are plainly putting things in train for a capital operation, for which there is no apparent necessity. It should be evident on slight reflection that things have not reached that fateful stage where nothing short of a capital operation can be counted on to save the life of the Vested Interests in America; not yet. And indeed, things need assuredly not reach such a stage if reasonable measures are taken to avoid undue alarm and irritation. All that is needed to keep the underlying population of America in a sweet temper is a degree of patient ambiguity and delay, something after the British pattern, and all will yet be well with the vested rights of property and privilege, for some time to come.

On the basis even of these few sentences, and still more with the entire article in view, one might ask just why the writer speaks, in his title, of the “danger” of a revolutionary overturn rather than the “hope.” The word was deliberately chosen. He is writing not merely to the already convinced, with whom “the Revolution” is an eager hope rather than a fear-inspiring danger, but still more to those who are as yet a little doubtful, and might recoil from too unqualified a display of revolutionary purpose. It is better strategy, “just yet,” to treat the Revolution, at least part of the time, as the alternative in case “the Guardians of the Vested Interests” will not make desired concessions. This may effectively frighten the conservative, and yet not seriously trouble the half-way radical, so as to tumble him off the fence on the conservative side. And yet it would not do to press the “danger” side too much. The masses will not take the leap if the ground on which they must light seems too rugged. And so Professor Veblen throws down a cushion, not in the form of a statement of his own opinion, which might be subject to discount as prejudiced, but by telling the reader that “the Elder Statesmen are in position to know, without much inquiry, that there is no single spot or corner in civilized Europe or America where the underlying population would have anything to lose by such an overturn of the established order as would cancel the vested rights of privilege and property, whose guardians they are.” Of course these “Guardians of the Vested Interests” cannot know anything that is not a fact; and the smooth assumption that it is a fact, aided by the deft misuse of the odious word “privilege,” is far more effective than would have been the mere statement that it was true in the opinion of Thorstein Veblen, sociologist.

Amid the indefinite “not just yet” that dot his paragraphs, there is once or twice a little closer grip with the question of time. There is an air of immediate possibility in the statement that “something of the kind is felt to be due, on the ground of the accomplished facts.” Again, we are told that “it has been argued, and it seems not unreasonable to believe, that the established order of business enterprise, vested rights, and commercialized nationalism, is due presently to go under in a muddle of shame and confusion.” On the whole, he thinks it quite hazardous to guess, “just yet,” how distant may be “that consummation of commercial imbecility.” Some argue that it is plainly due within two years, while others would leave the present system a probable duration of several times that interval. But he feels obliged to admit that “these latter appear, on the whole, to be persons who are less intimately acquainted with the facts in the case.” The upshot of the time discussion is that “there is yet something of a margin to go on; so much so, that, barring accident, there should seem to be no warrant for counting at all confidently on a disastrous breakdown of the business system within anything like a two-year period.” Let not the “Guardians of the Vested Interests,” however, take too much comfort from this allowance of two years plus, for in a previous paragraph he has shown how extremely easy it is for “accidents” to occur, and in the second article he presses the point at length. It is as if you had been exposed to the smallpox. Your doctor reassures you with the assertion that even if you take it at all it will be two days at least, and perhaps considerably longer, before you do. Enjoy yourself as usual in the meanwhile. And yet you cannot keep from looking fearfully in the mirror every half-hour. Such is the state of mind into which Veblen and his class of revolutionists would put the American people, for in just that unsettled state of mind revolution would find its profit if once it could be set on foot.

To go back to our figure, what is the texture of the new gown which Veblen would have our Goddess of Liberty put on? It is to be a soviet silk, of Russian pattern, but with a difference. He realizes that a revolution against the present system would be futile, and followed by certain reaction, unless there is some capable agency definitely ready to take its place in the production of the necessities of modern life. His common sense tells him that the ordinary workmen cannot meet this imperative requirement. As a substitute, then, for the “business management” against which he is so rabidly set in the present order, his hope lies in a “soviet of technicians.” And since technicians of adequate ability and experience are not inclined to be revolutionary, but on the contrary are “a harmless and docile sort, well fed, on the whole, and somewhat placidly content with the full dinner-pail which the lieutenants of the Vested Interests habitually allow them,” the “two years plus” grows again, unless the technicians can be sneered or argued or driven out of their conservative attitude of mind.

But there is a further obstacle, which Veblen does not recognize. The great majority of the technicians themselves are skilled and experienced not in the entire field of their particular industry, but only in some one of its many divisions. It is absurd to assume, as Professor Veblen continually does, that the business management of any successful industrial concern is virtually unrelated to, and a mere incubus upon, the work of its technical personnel. There are exceptional individuals on either side who could do the work of the other, but as a whole each group has its own indispensable place in the mechanism of the entire plant, a relation of which both are thoroughly aware. And so a soviet of technicians, to take industry out of the hands of business managers, is no more likely than a soviet of business managers to supplant the technicians; “not just yet.”

A Republic Without Republicans?

A WRITER in the London Spectator warns his readers not to believe in the republicanism of the German people. Wilhelm von Hohenzollern, it is true, has lost much sympathy by ignominiously taking to his heels, and the ex-Crown Prince is little better liked than his father. But "to infer that because the people do not care for a particular individual to reign over them, therefore they are republicans, is utterly illogical."

These words recall to mind the early days of the Third Republic, when France was reproached, in the very same terms, with dissembling her true nature. "Une République sans Republicanisme" was a current phrase in 1871, and few doubted that the name hit the mark. The National Assembly, though elected by universal suffrage, was an anti-republican body, for no French Legislature of the century had included so many men of rank and fortune. The monarchists were in the majority, and the Radicals, the advocates of the Republic, far from popular, in consequence of the excesses of the Commune in Paris, which had brought republicanism into discredit. There was a general belief, both in France and abroad, that the days of the new Republic would soon be numbered. The atrocities of the Commune were sure to bring about a reaction, and outside France the impression prevailed that the nation was too fickle to put up with any form of government for any great length of time. What stability could one expect from a people which, within twenty years of its Declaration of the Rights of Man had entrusted its destinies to the despotic soldier-Emperor whose entire career made havoc of those noble principles; which, after the Emperor's fall, had accepted from its conquerors the heirs of the old régime, obsolete exponents of the divine right of kings; had then turned away from these and chosen a Constitutional monarchy à l'Anglaise; to plunge, eighteen years later, into new revolution, and install another Napoleon as guardian over the Second Republic, which four years later was again to be changed for an Empire. Both the experience of the past and the political constellation of the present made the long continuance of the Third Republic seem an impossibility.

But what seemed impossible then seemed so no longer in 1873. The Monarchists, still in the majority in the National Assembly, were alarmed at the results of the legislative elections of April 27 and May 11, which revealed a rapid growth of the Radical party. The Duc de Broglie, speaking for the 302 signatures of an interpellation addressed to the Cabinet by the Right, summarized the interpellation in these words: "What does the Cabinet stand for? For resistance to the radicals, or for concessions to that party?" By scrupulously avoiding the two words Monarchy and Republic he tried to veil from his listeners the real question at issue. It was not from radicalism that the Republic had to be saved, it was from republicanism, thus made odious by its identification with radicalism, that the monarchy had to be rescued. Thiers, in his famous reply on the following morning, stated that truth with unsparing directness: "What divides us here is the question of Monarchy or Republic; there is no other question. Do you know the reason why I, an old partisan of the Monarchy, have declared myself for the Republic? Because, at this juncture, the Monarchy for you and for me is, in practice, impossible. I need not tell you why impossible: there is only one throne, and three together cannot occupy it."

The old statesman saw better than his opponents who turned him out, and who thought to have found a Monk in Marshal MacMahon. They only ushered in an era of reactionary incompetence, and each recurring occasion helped to confirm a growing conviction that anti-republicanism was identical with political ineptitude. "Note the blindness of political passion," writes M. Hanotaux, "the Conservatives did not see that in turning out M. Thiers they turned out the last of the Conservatives." They refused to inaugurate the Republic and could not found the Monarchy. So they helped against their will to bring in the Republic of the radicals. They would not believe in the conservatism of Thiers, which was of the type extolled by the poet:

That man's the true conservative
Who lops the mouldered branch away, and, having discarded that true conservative, clung on to the mouldering branch that would never blossom again. With the Septennate of MacMahon the Republic became established in spite of the Monarchists, who had hoped to use it as a bridge which might lead to the Monarchy. For nearly half a century the so-called fickle French nation has remained loyal to its Republic, and the war has been the fire in which the metal of that loyalty was tested, and proved pure gold.

Prophets are telling us now that the restoration of the German Monarchy is near at hand. The signs, they say, are unmistakable. In country churches, prayers are offered up for the Kaiser and the royal family, the country newspapers have not changed their policy, von Hindenburg is prevented by Pan-German students from giving evidence before the War Investigation Committee, and monarchists are plotting at Amerongen against the Government of Herr Ebert. Conditions, indeed, are different from those in France forty-eight years ago. There are no rival houses to split the Monarchist party into contending factions, there are no leaders of the talent of Thiers to point the right way. But on the other hand there is, instead of national unity, a variety of local patriotisms, Prussian, Bavarian, Saxon, Rhinelandish, which may prove fatal to the hopes of the dethroned kings of Prussia. And there is a strong Social-Democratic party, far exceeding in power and influence the Radical party of Gambetta.

We are prone to exaggerate the importance of current events. Each little disturbance of the normal, an ovation to Ludendorff, an old pastor found signing himself Hofprediger, the flying visit of a "Kaisertreuer" at Amerongen, are deemed shadows projected by the imminent calamity of a monarchical coup d'état. But the history of the birth of the Third Republic makes one cautious in interpreting those alarming symptoms. Whatever men may scheme, the trend of history in these days is decided by powers beyond the control of individuals.

It is an error to imagine that we, bewildered readers of the daily newspaper, can gather from it a foreknowledge of the course that will be taken. The multitude of facts dims our perception of the main currents through which the fate of the world is moving on. Wishing to know a little of many events, we must be satisfied not to know much about anything. We touch with our noses the great canvas of time, to scrutinize the finesse of the divine artist, but in doing so lose sight of the picture as a whole, not knowing whether the landscape is overcast by the clouds of the thunderstorm or illumined by the break of a new day.

"A Vehicle of Life"

ALMOST every feature of the Treaty of Peace and League of Nations Covenant has been exhaustively discussed, yet one important consideration, not without its bearing on several disputed points, has been largely overlooked. The settlement, in Mr. Wilson's phrase, should have been a "vehicle of life"; yet the treaty fails to provide any adequate method of achieving this ideal, and the arguments against various territorial adjustments and obligations are made possible, or at least are made more valid, by the absence of any provisions for improving the hasty work of the Paris Conference. If the treaty is a "vehicle of life," it is slow moving and likely to encounter trouble unless it is remodelled. There is a hint of the truth in the Taft and Root pronouncements, but, from this standpoint, they are concerned with the possibilities of Article X rather than with the general principle.

It is now the fashion to quote Mr. Wilson against himself, and in his addresses are to be found definite expressions of the ideal that has been since abandoned. One of the President's speeches in England, before the Conference began, admitted a greater doubt of complete success than he has ever hinted at in addressing Americans. He expressed his lack of hope that "the individual items of the settlement we are about to attempt will be altogether satisfactory." "And yet," he added, amid cheers, "if we are to make unsatisfactory settlements, we must see to it that they are rendered more and more satisfactory by subsequent adjustments which are made possible. So we must provide the machinery of readjustment in order that we may have the machinery of good will and friendship." When he read the first draft of the Covenant to a plenary session of the Conference, Mr. Wilson said that the Covenant was "not a straight-jacket," but that "a living thing is born and we must see to it what clothes we put on it." Later, still retaining this figure of speech, the President declared, before the International Law Association, that "we must weave out of the old materials the new garments which it is necessary that men should wear."

Extreme difficulty, nevertheless, will be experienced in making the treaty fit new conditions. With the exception of a few special arrangements, the obligations imposed upon Germany—and the other defeated states—are apparently for all time. Part II of the treaty, for example, dealing with the boundaries of Germany, contains no hint that any revision may be necessary. Changes could come by the unanimous agreement of all the signatory Powers, but that would be difficult and could be achieved only after unpleasantry and "scrap of paper" charges. The secret treaties are sufficient evidence of the desire of states to insist, at any price, upon the fulfillment of international obligations that are favorable to them. To be sure, the League Covenant can be amended, but it will be difficult to arouse this international sovereign to action and even if aroused, it will be incompetent to prevent the world from remaining in a strait jacket. Nor does Article XIX provide an escape. To say that "The Assembly may from time to time advise the reconsideration by members of the League of treaties which have become inapplicable" is not very helpful. For example, the veto of France in the Council is by express provision sufficient to prevent the union of Austria and Germany. The question of the Polish boundaries could be brought before the Assembly, but action must be unanimous. Even if the Council assumed jurisdiction, and decided unanimously for a revision, this could accomplish nothing, for there is no method provided of enforcing the award. The only stipulation (Article XV) is that a member of the League may not go to war with a party which complies with such a decision, and it is inconceivable that if the question were then taken to the Assembly, as is possible under this Article, and a majority decision were secured, it would be legally valid, since the concurrence of all members of the Council—including France—is required. Even so, no sanction is provided, and the static world thus achieved is made the more certain by Article X.

This consideration was hinted at, although not stressed, by Mr. Root in his first letter on the League Covenant. To attempt, he said, "to preserve for all time unchanged the distribution of power and territory made in accordance with the views and exigencies of Allies in this present juncture of affairs," would be both futile and mischievous. "Change and growth are the law of life, and no generation can impose its will in regard to the growth of nations and the distribution of power upon succeeding generations." As the British delegation said, when the Covenant was first published, "One generation cannot hope to bind its successors by written words"; in Lord Acton's fine phrase, there must be no "tyranny of the dead over the living." This, it seems to me, is a much more powerful argument against Article X than purely national interests and possibilities of trouble. The extent of Mr. Wilson's defeat in Paris is in part measured by the rigidity of this Article, for the analogous provision in the President's own draft of the Covenant (Article III) would have made possible territorial readjustments which became necessary on account of changes in racial conditions or political relationships, and declared "without reservation the principle that the peace of the world is superior in importance to every question of political jurisdiction or boundary." Article X, however, would guarantee for all time the arrangements of the Versailles treaties—good, bad, and indifferent.

Mr. Root and Mr. Taft, therefore, suggest a time limit for the obligations of this Article. But John Stuart Mill—not a writer who is frequently cited on questions of international relations—long ago urged a solution which has, I think, considerable merit. Writing in 1870 (article on "Treaty Obligations" in the Fortnightly Review), Mill called attention to the prevalent disregard of treaty obligations, chiefly by Russia, and in some cases justifiable. Congresses had in 1814 and 1815 agreed upon a set of treaties which regulated the external, and some of the internal, affairs of European nations. These treaties were intended to last for all time. Imposed by the victorious states at the conclusion of the war—just as treaties are now imposed by the victorious Allies—the terms of the engagements "were regulated by the interests and relative strength at the time of the victors and vanquished and were observed as long as those interests and that relative strength remained the same." Alterations, however, took place in these elements; and the Powers began to refuse to regard such provisions as were displeasing to them. Public opinion in some cases sustained this action; in other cases, the violation of the treaty was not deemed sufficiently serious to justify a resort to war. "Europe did not interpose when Russia annihilated Poland; when Prussia, Austria, and Russia extinguished the Republic of Cracow; or when a second Bonaparte mounted the throne of France." No one blamed Prussia and Austria when, in 1813, they refused to live up to the treaties which bound them to Napoleon and pledged them to fight in his ranks. Since Mill wrote, there have been many additional illustrations of treaties that were torn up, without the general disapprobation of world opinion. In 1886 Russia withdrew from certain provisions of the Treaty of Berlin of 1878; only Great Britain protested. In 1908 Austria annexed Bosnia and Herzegovina and in 1911 Italy declared war against Turkey in violation of the Treaty of Paris of March 30, 1856, by which England, France, Prussia, Russia, and Italy undertook to respect the territorial integrity of the Ottoman Empire. These are only a few of the many instances that could be cited and there is no reason to believe that the agreements made at the Paris Conference will prove any more satisfactory.

The problem, Mill said, was to reconcile, "in the greatest practical degree, the inviolability of treaties and the sanctity of national faith, with the undoubted fact that treaties are not always fit to be kept, while yet those who have imposed them upon others weaker than themselves are not likely, if they retain confidence in their own strength, to grant a release from them. To effect this reconciliation, so far as it is capable of being effected, nations should be willing to abide by two rules. They should abstain from imposing conditions which, on any just and reasonable view of human affairs, cannot be expected to be kept. And they should conclude their treaties as commercial treaties are usually concluded, only for a term of years."

Mill's first caveat against unwise conditions is a problem in itself; but if the treaty contains such provisions, it would seem the more necessary to allow for their amendment, not to speak of changes to meet new conditions. That would make less likely the use of collective force in order to prevent a disturbance and compel compliance with regulations that have become obsolete and whose enforcement would be an injustice. One trouble with previous international settlements is that they did not allow for any change; they sought to preserve for all time the then existing international order. And yet if there had not been change in international relations, we should have had no Belgium, no separation of Norway and Sweden, no united Germany, no united Italy. Racial problems in the Balkans have always been known to students; but who ten years ago would have prophesied that in 1919 we should determine what political recognition is due the Czechs and Slovaks and Ruthenians and Jugoslavs? The Holy Alliance did not allow for the forces of democracy and nationalism; other equally unforeseen problems will come up in the future; territorial adjustments will be necessary; protectorates and vassal states, created by the Conference, will be ready to cast off their swaddling clothes, and there is continually the necessity for change in economic arrangements. The truth of this is shown by the fact that commercial treaties are almost always for a definite term of years or are subject to termination upon twelve months' notice. The tension and resentment when a treaty comes to an end are not considered too high a price to pay for the abandonment of obsolete and unfair provisions.

It is true, of course, that many treaties

by implication, if not by express provision, include the clause rebus sic stantibus, and that the contracting parties reserve the right to refuse to be bound if the conditions obtaining at the time the treaty was negotiated undergo any material change. Some publicists deny that this clause is included in treaties. At the conference of London in 1871 the Powers declared that "it is an essential principle of the law of nations that no Power can liberate itself from the engagement of a treaty, or modify the stipulations thereof, unless with the consent of the contracting Powers by means of an amicable settlement." This would seem to deny the principle of rebus sic stantibus, but in any event there is the serious and delicate question as to whether such a clause can be implied in a particular treaty and also as to whether the conditions have in fact changed. These questions would be avoided by frankly recognizing that, like national constitutions and legislation, international enactments are not for all time. It may be wise to make change difficult and to be certain that hasty, ignorant passion is not translated into the public law of nations. But there should certainly not be an attempt to put international treaties in the same class with the multiplication table.

We hear much about a League of Nations involving an impairment of sovereignty and limiting national action, but the greatest impairment of sovereignty is a treaty made for all time. Frequently its existence is forgotten until suddenly, with no warning, a state is confronted by repudiation or by being held to arrangements that seriously oppose its national interest. Nor is there anything more deadening to an intelligent interest in foreign affairs than a series of treaties which assume a static world and do not provide for change. On the other hand it is difficult to have a greater stimulus to education than would result from the possibility of revising all international agreements. Constitutional changes achieving popular control of foreign policy are not all-important. It has been notorious that peoples have known little and cared less about international problems; and if there is hope for the future of international society it is dependent on a well-informed public opinion. In domestic affairs, through somewhat hard experiences, the people have learned that great power without knowledge does not avail them as much as knowledge with less power; and that knowledge is denied them if the world is put in a strait-jacket.

The contentions of those who would have the United States limit its obligations derive great force from the danger which exists when permanent treaties can be appealed to, when injustices are legalized, when change is made difficult, and when apathy is encouraged. Obsolete treaty provisions are a greater international evil than the conflicting interests which would develop at revising conferences held in the future. Doubts concerning Shantung, the Saar Basin, and various boundaries; the objections of the Left to the punitive features of the Treaty, and the desire to put a time limit on America's obligations—all have the more force because the settlement is not "a vehicle of life." But Mr. Wilson's indispensable ideal should not be lost sight of, and efforts must be made to achieve it in the readjustments that will come when the League begins to function. International peace is dependent upon international change, and when it is certain that the dead cannot tyrannize over the living, perhaps Americans will be ready to enter without too many reservations a world organization.

England's Disillusion

DISILLUSION in this anniversary week of the Armistice seems to an observer the most marked national feature. Throughout the war the encouraging idea permeated the mentality of the English people that, the war over, men and women would return to the normal life of 1914. It was suggested by foreseeing persons, rather uncertainly perhaps, that things would not be as they had been, but in a time of such anxiety and uncertainty no one cared to analyze the days to come. So one prevailing comfort—that had much to do with the calmness and courage with which the ever optimistic Englishman endured the darkest days—was the vision of the past as the dream of the future, a future happy in a new and peaceful fraternity of nations sprung from the fraternization of the battle-fields; the old order, in short, in more ideal circumstances.

When at length the war came to an end, he began to expect his dream to become a reality. But another vision was before the eyes of the country. The Government had called on it, over and over again, for financial help. Millions were poured into the Exchequer, men of business and corporations positively advertised the thousands which they contributed. To the uneducated eye the wealth of England seemed at once enormous and unlimited. Thousands of persons were in receipt of wages, who had, before the war, hardly earned a penny, and the pay of others was doubled and trebled. If expenses were rising higher, wages had only to be asked for to be received. Disillusion has, however, now set in from the war vision and the peace orgy alike. Probably the first real blow to both was the rise of six shillings a ton in coal: it was a high explosive bomb. It at once struck imagination and common-sense, and compelled a realization of facts. But just as Englishmen recovered, during the war, from shattering and disappointing military disasters, so they seem to have recovered from the first blow of peace. The country is perplexed and suspicious, ready to pounce on victims, and to be angry at administrative scandals and financial extravagance. Circumstances have combined to produce this atmosphere of disillusion: the books of military and naval commanders, revelations in Government reports, the slow progress at Paris, the international debate at Washington, the many social and economic problems at home which penetrate into the household of every citizen.

Yet high prices are beginning to be accepted as something wholly normal—disagreeable enough but, like a wet day, something to be put up with. Enormous hardship, and even suffering, caused by high prices is apparent in various sections of the community, but, taking the country as a whole, the disappointment of the peace time is being borne with the same national composure as the evils of war time. The social and economic changes consequent on a probably prolonged period of high prices and high wages are as yet visible only in their inception—changes in the ownership of land, of domestic life, of education, of manners and of dress and among manual laborers a higher standard of dress and a larger expenditure on amusement. Never, for instance, in the history of the British turf have race courses been so crowded, largely by the weekly wage earners, as during the last summer. Yet the idea of economy is certainly growing, it is in the voices in the street, and it will become more universal since the actual profits of war have ceased and as abnormal doles to manual workers come to an end.

Realization that increase of wages means an increase of cost to the community generally is gradually sinking into the mind of the masses of the nation and this will be more acutely perceived as the winter passes. In agricultural districts the increased wages of laborers will certainly mean a diminution during the winter in the employment of hands. Already an increase in the use of tractors for ploughing is observable in rural England. Again, both high wages and mechanical instruments in agriculture are likely to have a very serious effect on the schemes for small holdings, which were to be one of the blessings of the Utopia, which was—we were told—to succeed the war.

Englishmen have not, however, been called a nation of shopkeepers for nothing. The gibe is a tribute to their common sense, patience, and adaptability. They will show these characteristics in the post-war period as they did throughout the time of hostilities. As in the war, so in the peace age they are in advance of the Government and demand measures of sound finance and of economy, irrespective of political parties or political fortunes. A Coalition Government, such as now exists in England, cannot have a strong line of policy on these points, it must live by opportunism, and sooner or later the national disillusion will extend to the whole political situation, if indeed it has not already begun to do so.

After the conclusion of the great European Wars of the Spanish Succession, when the victories of Marlborough were closed by the Peace of Utrecht, there came, opportunely, on the scene a figure exactly suited to the time and its task. The English people, in a critical and subdued temper, now look around but they do not yet see another Walpole.

An Embargo on Talk

THE two fatalities that pursue what we are pleased to call democracy are talking and legislating. All the evil in the world comes from talking, and it began when the devil argued Eve into eating the forbidden fruit and Eve nagged Adam into joining with her in defying the law. Talking and making new laws will vitiate any scheme of government, however good, and as for democracy they are fatal.

A case in point is that of the President of the United States who apparently has talked himself to death in defense of a gross product of too much talking. Our fighting men won the war and our talking men lost the peace, and now a great river of more talk, from Congressmen and journalists and other orators, must be deflected from its original bed to cover the unhonored remains. Society is sick unto death, and no wonder, for nothing is immune before torrents of vocal sound, but what it needs is not words but acts. It is acts that count, not talk; that is one of the reasons why the soldier is more honorable than the lawyer, why the monk does more than the preacher.

There is nothing more grotesquely undignified than the sight of the Chief Magistrate of a great nation careering over the country and talking all the time, except the same practice on his own part when he was trying to talk the voters into electing him. It is a fad at present to amend the Constitution while the amending is good; let us go further and pass a new amendment debarring a Presidential candidate from making a public speech in his own interest, and a President from speaking publicly on any subject outside the walls of the Capitol.

The world is being talked to death, just as a perfectly good peace was talked to death. Instead of hundreds of expert professional talkers assembling from the uttermost parts of the earth to argue and debate and dicker for months while the devil got in his deadly and most efficient work, the results of which are now increasingly in evidence, what should have been done was to lock Marshals Foch, Joffre, and Haig, Generals Pershing and Diaz, King Albert of Belgium and Cardinal Mercier, in the Palace of Versailles, give them good food and better wines, throw a military guard around the palace, disconnect the telephones, and allow them ten days in which to produce terms of peace, with a guaranty that they would be accepted by all the Allies without debate, and enforced on the defeated enemy without parley.

Had this been done the result would have been a short, sharp, decisive, intelligent, intelligible document, just, honorable, and righteous; nine months of peace with something accomplished towards recovery, the confinement of Bolshevism within narrow Russian limits (perhaps even its extinction), and for ourselves the marked advantage of a very capable President constantly at work at his proper job in Washington. Failing this, we have had the exact reverse in every particular, with Something unleashed throughout the world that may not be confined again until it has destroyed civilization—or given the whip-hand to “defeated” Prussia, which amounts to the same thing.

Parliamentary government has now conspicuously demonstrated not only its complete futility but also its grotesque absurdity. Etymologically the word should have carried its own warning. “Parliament,” a talkshop. What we want is not a parliament but a “factament,” a place where things are done, and with as few words as possible. We are suffering from chronic and acute logorrhoea, the most debilitating disease known (or unknown) to the pharmacopœa. Who shall deliver us from the body of this (logomachical) death?

There was once a superstition that free speech and plenty of it was a natural right and the palladium of our liberties;

that if we all talked long and loud enough we should, as a necessary consequence, elect the right men to office, pass the best possible laws, insure the most even handed distribution of justice, and compel our executives to administer the laws after a holy and impeccable fashion. What, in the light of the last fifty years of parliamentary (that is to say talking) government, is the reaction of intelligence to this interesting theoretical stimulus?

There is occasionally—not always—much truth in very common sayings. One of the true phrases is "Put up or shut up!" A very valuable and profound piece of advice. On the other hand "Talk never killed a cat" is indefensible in principle; it may not have actually killed a cat but it has been the source of untold domestic misery (beside which the evils of the demon rum are negligible); it has caused the death of decads of millions of men, women, and children, and it has brought several perfectly good civilizations to an end in black disaster, besides a number less admirable, including, incidentally, our own.

What we need at this juncture is a moratorium on language, particularly spoken, though writers (amongst whom I include myself) are not guiltless. As concrete measures I suggest that, as stated above, no candidate for chief executive of any city or State or of the nation should be permitted to argue in public for his own election; that the number of words allowed a candidate for office during his campaign should be rigidly limited by statute, and that he should be compelled to file a sworn statement of the actual number of words he has spent; that words should be rationed, and something like food cards issued to those who wish to use them in public; that proposed laws should be posted publicly, printed in the daily papers, and then voted on by the legislators without debate, and that the old laws and penalties against "common scolds" should be revived and made applicable not only to contentious ladies but also to males who display similar habits.

Perhaps, after we have returned again to civilization, something like this may be reported in the papers as an item of not extraordinary news:

The Judge (putting on the black cap): "Prisoner at the Bar, you have been charged with the wilful, cruel, and inordinate use of language, and you have been found guilty by a jury of your peers. This is the most heinous offence known in law, and very justly the penalty has been made as severe as the crime is abominable. It is always the desire of this Court to temper justice with mercy, but in this case the jury has found that the evidence proves you have matched in your prodigal expenditure of language that great verbal expeditor of the last century, William Jennings Bryan. Under the circumstances, and in the light of this verdict, the Court has no discretion and is bound to inflict the utmost penalty of the law. Prisoner at the Bar, you are sentenced to penal servitude for life in the Congress of the United States, and may God have mercy on your soul."

An embargo on talk would play havoc with law-making, and this would be not the least of its virtues. In the good old days the object of government was to find out what was the accepted custom and then enforce it. New laws were seldom needed, and the necessity is but little greater to-day, yet by some crazy whim of "social evolution" (the thing known to philosophers as social degeneration) the function of a legislative body has come to be not only the authorizing of supplies but the proposing of as many new laws as human ingenuity can devise and the enacting of as many of these as the hours in the day will permit and the Star Chamber committees allow to get by. It is bad enough in the British Parliament, where there may be four hundred bills introduced in a single session, but what shall we say of Washington where this number is sometimes multiplied by thirty?

Congress has at last taken up the vital question of a financial budget and it will deserve well of history if it enacts the Good bill, or some other of similar nature. So will pass the most ridiculous and inefficient method (without method) of providing for the financial necessities of Government ever in practice anywhere or at any time. Ignorance, self-interest, and a doctrinaire "democracy" that was the negation of real democracy, intrenched behind almost invincible superstition, have fought the reform for years, and it is almost a miracle that the same legislative body that perpetrated national prohibition should have so far redeemed itself as to give promise of endorsing this admirable bill.

But the cognate reform cries out with equal emphasis for enactment. We need not only a fiscal budget but a legislative budget as well. Something like the following process should be established by law.

At the opening of each legislative session, whether it is municipal, State, or Federal, the Chief Executive should present a definite programme of such legislation as in his opinion is necessary. This should be in the form of bills accurately drawn by the proper officer, and until each such bill has been passed or defeated by the legislature, no private bill could be introduced. Further, no private bill should be introduced unless it had the endorsement of a certain number of legislators, or was supported by the petition of a certain number of legal voters.

Perhaps this is the basis for a new Party—an idea in itself not without humor—the Conservation of Language and a Legislative Budget.

A Letter from General Petliura

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

This letter from the President of the Republican Directorate of the Ukraine has a pathetic interest in view of the reported capture by Denikin of the Ukrainian liberator. It is dated at Kamenets-Podolsk on the 28th of September last. It is addressed to M. Jean Pelissier, the French diplomatic agent who helped to organize the anti-Bolshevik uprising in the Ukraine. It has been communicated to the executives of France, England, Italy, and the United States. The accusations against General Denikin are interesting as revealing the Ukrainian point of view, but should be regarded with all reserve. What is likely is that the monarchist minority supporting both Petliura and Kolchak have written heavy "reinsurance" with Germany. The letter illustrates vividly the present plight of the Ukraine and the difficulties of harmonizing the anti-Bolshevik factions. Its noble gravity and eloquence constitute it a historical document of exceptional importance.

AMERICAN

New York, November 22

Mon cher ami Pelissier,

I rejoice at the opportunity of sending you my ardent salutations and of thanking you and all the supporters of our just and sacred cause for the powerful aid which you give our people in its struggle for liberty. . . .

I should have every reason to rejoice profoundly if the incessant efforts which you exert for the Ukraine are crowned with success and if, after having triumphed over all the obstacles and broken all the bonds, we should see you in the capital of Ukraina as representative of the real interests of your glorious country. . . .

An epoch has passed since I last saw you. Since then we have undergone many ordeals, and many a white hair marks on our heads the grievous stages of the road we have travelled. We have many enemies, but they make the unity of our national will and arouse in us the ardent desire to conquer the sovereignty of our fatherland. At the present hour, our most dangerous adversary is General Denikin, who, instead of fighting the Bolsheviks, has turned against us the artillery and rifles which he has received from the Allies and thus has weakened the anti-Bolshevik front. We have every reason to believe that Denikin, while receiving money of the Entente, also receives some from Germany, and his officers announce openly that after having defeated the Ukrainians, their chief will begin the strife against the Poles and Rumanians.

We have had no aid from anyone: neither munitions nor technical apparatus, nor sanitary products, nothing. Ah, if you knew, Friend Pelissier, what tragic hours we have lived in our abandonment! It often happens that our soldiers are without cartridges. Then they charge with the bayonet against the Bolsheviks. The examples of heroism which they give, the bloody sacrifices which they make, are unique in military annals.

Three-quarters of our men lack shoes, clothing, everything; but their esprit is not impaired. We have no medicines; typhus decimates our army; many fighters die for lack of medicines and blankets. Alas, the Powers of the Entente, which proclaim such sublime principles, do not even permit the Red Cross to come to us. We are dying, the Allies wash their hands like Pilate, there remains for us only to say, "Morituri te salutamus." No one knows better than you, my friend, that apart from political changes and combinations, there exist certain immutable principles of humanity and philanthropy. It is for the accomplishment of these principles that the Red Cross has been created and works. Their sections should have come into the Ukraine, to save the sick and wounded, and thus to bear witness that pity and love of one's neighbor are checked by no prejudice and do not divide men into good and bad, wolves and sheep.

I appeal in this matter through you to the great French Democracy, that her activity and zeal may be doubled. That she may sound the alarm. That she may force those who are concerned to obey the high laws of love and humanity. That your Government may suppress the blockade, and give us the possibility of buying for our army and our people the medical stores and remedies which we lack.

We have had rich harvests, and will pay with grain whatever is necessary to succor our people, smitten on the field of battle or exhausted by epidemics.

I firmly hope that my appeal will not be a cry in the void and that it will find in the democratic groups of France a mighty and sympathetic echo.

Our people have a horror of the Bolsheviks; they consider them as mortal enemies, as likewise we treat as enemies the Bolsheviks of a new sort—those of the Right, the despotic and ferocious partisans of Denikin. These last have the same methods as the Bolsheviks of the Left, and in some fashion there exists among them a strategic plan against the Ukraine and the Ukrainians. Denikin merely leads the water to the mill of Bolshevism, of which he is an accomplice. And the water is supplied by the Entente. What a deplorable point of view! It is a veritable political Daltonism. I most ardently hope that the directing classes of the Entente may be cured of that malady, and at length may see things as they are.

In the painful and pathetic condition under which we are compelled to build our future and continue our war for liberty, we are consoled by the knowledge that men exist who, despite the general blindness surrounding them, have a just comprehension of our situation and break through the restraints of prejudice and mistrust. That permits my friends and myself to bear more easily the heavy cross which has been placed on our shoulders by destiny. You, my friend, are one of those who "sine ira et studio" plead for justice to our nation, and have an unconquerable confidence that our just cause will triumph.

votre main en témoignage de reconnaissance pour votre secours moral et pour votre noble labeur.

Votre toujours dévoué, Petliura.

["General" Petliura's interesting letter bears testimony to the Slavic gift of eloquence, regardless of the intrinsic merits of the cause. There is no question as to the frightful suffering of the hapless population of the rich plains of the Ukraine, torn by civil war and stricken by epidemic disease. For this sad state of affairs, French policy is in no small degree responsible. Despite the patriotic periods of Petliura's letter, the fact remains that he is merely the bold adventurous leader who took advantage of the agrarian discontent following the successive German, Austrian, and French occupations, to form an army to champion an alleged nationalism. That it combated the Red forces of Soviet Russia is to its credit, although it differed little from them in theory or practice. The charges of Petliura against Denikin and his army are but natural. Despite his accusation, Denikin's army is making the reconquest and liberation of Russia its first objective, while the mass of Russians regard the separatist campaign of Petliura and his attack upon their flanks as treacherous. They do not for a moment consider the possibility of a Ukraina separated from Russia. The charge that Denikin is receiving money from Germany and playing into the hands of the Germans requires more proof than Petliura's word, although there is no doubt that there are plenty of Russians with Denikin who feel very bitter toward the French and regard a future association with the Germans as unavoidable.

Paul Margueritte on Literary Prizes

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

The other evening, just after putting down the November issue of Miss Monroe's Poetry, the "Prize-Award Number," where three young bards are given cash guerdon and over a score of others less resounding honorable mentions, I happened on one of the last letters of the late Paul Margueritte, of the Goncourt Academy, who examines this very question of moneyed recognition of literary productions—a matter, by the way, which has its enemies as well as its friends in both France and America. Here is what he wrote me:

Personnellement, je ne suis pas très partisan des prix en littérature. Mais il faut compter avec les difficultés, l'absence presque générale de critique littéraire et la vénalité de la Presse. Le prix Goncourt de cinq mille francs constitue, par son caractère spécial, une réelle publicité aux jeunes écrivains qui l'obtiennent.

En second lieu, ce prix n'a eu nullement l'inconvénient qu'on aurait pu redoubter—candidats chercher une manière destinée à leur assurer le succès. La variété étonnante des livres primés est, à ce point de vue, rassurante.

England's Bit

FIELDS OF VICTORY. By Mrs. Humphry Ward. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

THERE exists in this country a tendency more strongly marked in certain quarters and certain papers than in others, but far too wide spread to pass unnoticed and unchallenged, to belittle the part played by England in bringing the war to its sudden and successful close. How far this tendency springs from genuine and not unnatural pride in our own achievements, how far it is an artificial product of petty jealousy and political intrigue is not within the limits of a mere reviewer to inquire. But there can be no doubt that such a tendency is fraught with grave danger to that on which the hopes of the world depend, the mutual friendship and hearty coöperation of the two great branches of the English-speaking race. To all who believe in this coöperation and sympathize with every effort to strengthen this friendship, Mrs. Ward's latest book is warmly recommended as a frank, but by no means boastful exposition of England's achievements on the western front in the last phases of the war.

This third and final volume of Mrs. Ward's record was begun, she tells us, at the suggestion of Mr. Roosevelt in 1916, at a time when, under the double influence of ignorance and German propaganda, misconception and belittlement of England's part in the war were at their highest pitch in this country. It is in the form of a series of letters based upon a journey through the battlefields of France two months after the armistice, upon the published dispatches of Sir Douglas Haig, and upon conversations with officers of the General Staff, and soldiers at the War Office. Mrs. Ward motored some 900 miles in France, visiting the British and French fronts, Ypres and Arras, Verdun, Metz, and Strassburg. It is these fields of victory that furnish the title of her book. They are not all English victories, and Mrs. Ward has words of high praise for the heroic defenders of Verdun, and for the "crusading courage" of the conquerors of the Argonne; but her interest lies mainly and naturally with the armies of her own country.

In so far as Mrs. Ward's book is addressed to this country, and it is evidently written with a view to an American audience, it is a frank and brave attempt to protest against the supposed "loss of English prestige"—the phrase is that of an American journalist—as a consequence of the events of the war. No such loss was admitted by the British Army, she tells us, which at the moment of the armistice was conscious of having risen to the very zenith of its striking power and military efficiency. Beginning with the German offensive of last March, Mrs. Ward points out that the British retreat, of which we have heard so much, was in reality a great defensive battle, long and anxiously foreseen as the German forces on the western front were steadily increased throughout the winter by the addition of forces from the east. The British withdrawal was deeper, their losses in men and guns far heavier than had been anticipated; but there was neither rout nor loss of morale under the impact of doubly superior forces. The enemy obtained neither of his main objectives, the severance of the British army from the French nor the possession of the Channel ports, and the bloody check inflicted upon the Germans at Arras and the Vimy ridge, of which we have heard far less, by the way, than of the break through near St. Quentin, effectively crushed their hopes of victory over the British armies.

During the pause from April till mid-July, while the German offensive turned southward upon the French, the British forces were rapidly built up, their loss in heavy guns more than repaired, and all things put in order for the counterstroke. One immense gain had been conferred on the Allied armies by the German successes in the spring, a gain which in the end more than outbalanced their losses, that of unity of command. When the British turned to attack in July, it was not an isolated action that they fought, but a part of a great offensive conceived and directed by the master-strategist of the war, the Allied Generalissimo, Foch. The task that he assigned to the British was perhaps the hardest of all, no less than the carrying by storm of the great fortified zone of defense known as the Hindenburg line. But the British no longer stood as they had done in the spring on the outposts of the Hindenburg line. Four great battles had to be fought before the task assigned to them could even be attempted. They were fought in rapid succession, and won in each case with comparatively little loss, and with immense results in prisoners and captured guns. The battle of Amiens, August 8 to 13, carried the line twelve miles forward; a week later the battle of Bapaume swept the enemy clear across the old battlefields of the Somme; before this battle was well over the British First Army fell on the Germans along the banks of the Scarpe, and carried the famous Drocourt-Quéant switch of the Hindenburg line and a little later in the battle of Havrincourt, Haig, stormed the outer defenses of this line, and pushed his outposts to the banks of the St. Quentin canal. In these four preliminary engagements the British had recovered all the territory they had abandoned in the spring, had taken well over 80,000 prisoners and 1,000 cannon, and had shaken the enemy's morale.

Of the Hindenburg line Mrs. Ward gives a graphic account. It had been planned by the best brains and constructed by the best engineers in the German army. It was from four to seven miles deep, "line upon line of defenses such as had never before been imagined; system after complicated system of trenches, protected with machine-gun positions, with trench mortars, manned by a highly trained infantry, and supported by artillery of all calibres." Yet in a terrific three-day battle this line was shattered to bits. Canadian troops stormed the heights near Cambrai, the Guards pierced the centre, the St. Quentin canal was crossed by troops in life-belts swimming under heavy fire and two American divisions led the attack near the great tunnel where the canal passes underground. The whole offensive, in the judgment of no less an authority than Marshal Foch, was masterly in conception and execution. "No attack in the history of the world was ever better carried out." This victory practically decided the war. From that time the Germans only fought delaying actions; their one hope was to secure a retreat across the Rhine.

Mrs. Ward's chapters on America in France show a fine and generous appreciation of our contribution to the great cause. The coming of the first American troops did more than anything else to restore the morale of France in the bitter days of 1917. The flood of American soldiers in 1918 enabled the Allied leaders to take risks that they would not otherwise have dared, and the actual fighting of our men on the Marne, at St. Mihiel, and through the Argonne contributed essentially first to halt the German offensive and then to send the enemy rushing back in hopeless defeat. The question whether the Allies could have won without American aid Mrs. Ward considers a rather unprofitable speculation: "Thank God," she exclaims, "we did not win without America. The far-reaching effect of America's intervention, of her comradeship in the field of suffering and sacrifice with the free nations of old Europe, are only now beginning to show themselves above the horizon. They will be actively, and as at least the men and women of faith among us believe, beneficently at work, when this generation has long passed away."

A Romance of Friendship

New York: Scott and Seltzer.

GR^EAT claims are made by the publishers for this newest of Britain's "new novelists": that he is the right successor to Messrs. Bennett, Wells and Co., that he is "the coming novelist," and so on. We seem to have heard this sort of thing before, but hope springs eternal. Moreover, the "Publisher's Note" which serves as preface cites and quotes a letter from Romain Rolland of so extraordinary an enthusiasm as to spur one to the opening of the first page with all speed possible. The first page does not greatly enlighten us, nor the first chapter, nor even the first "Part." It appears to be good stuff of its kind or school. We are at home with its theme: the story of the talented and ambitious youth of the lower middle class with his way to make and, perhaps, his soul to find. He is son of an unfrocked parson; his mother holds the purse-strings and the authority of a narrow and unpleasant family life in an ugly provincial town. He is clever, shy, impressionable: he longs to escape and to "rise." Success in a small public school gives the necessary leverage. Oxford, London, authorship, "life," follow in due course. Once again our memory of the topography and traditions of Oxford is brushed up—of the schoolboy patter and "ragging" and winning and posing of that undergraduate personality which renews itself with so little change from generation to generation. Once again we taste the joys of the cockney Bohemia, of Grub Street, and presently of more prosperous regions among a more presentable elect. Once again we enter the bosom and share the fame of that rising young playwright who appears twenty times in the year's fiction to once in the year's fact. Once again we fall in love with the dear girl of that boy's dreams, and see them properly wedded. And we are unobtrusively thankful that if he does not come to her immaculate there is yet no gross smear of sex across the past he brings. . . . This, to be sure, is a "romance of friendship"; his relation to Murdoch is the dominant influence in Firbank's life. Petronella, with her self-sacrificing love, does what a woman may, for his delight and solace. But Murdoch makes him.

It is in Part II that we see the full working out of this relation in a manner and to a climax which will satisfy the reader according as he acquires, or fails of, belief in Murdoch and his "philosophy." And here we see where M. Rolland's enthusiasm comes in. For the sake of Murdoch's philosophy, we must believe, he swallows the unpleasant pill of Murdoch's personality. Nobody loves Murdoch but Firbank, and there are moments when we suspect that even he would not if he had the spirit of a slightly superior worm. Murdoch is a born-in-subordinate and individualist. He has a natural distrust for whatever is held to by the England which surrounds him and which menaces his personal freedom and egotism; with a vague and inexpensive leaning towards some wide world virtue which is about to emerge from somewhere and vindicate all the little egos in the act of taking them over for humanity. He despises the public school and its product, makes use of Oxford, without yielding her loyalty, carefully refrains from mingling thereafter with any of the vulgarities of an active maturity. He has "character enough to do nothing"—a real test. Integer vitae—the man whom nothing, not love, not business, not opinion or duress can budge from his stance. The Firbanks may be good fellows, brilliant even, but they are too ready to take color from their surroundings, to follow the crowd. It is the Murdochs who represent the hope of the world. . . .

Such appears to be his author's opinion of Murdoch and his status. Perhaps it is merely magnanimous of him—a yielding of a point—to make of Murdoch a person of disagreeable manner and supercilious attitude. In spite of all this, we are to grant his fine scent for Truth, his faultless taste in aesthetics, and his noble dream of a world purged of shams and shoddy—a world in which all individuals, freed of external control, shall miraculously move together towards the good of the whole. Would the Murdochs be happy in a cosmos of supermen? There is nothing to indicate it in their records to date. With zeal, in the name of mankind, they practise those tricks of singularity which mark their superiority to mankind. Disagreeable is the word for our Murdoch, since he makes a point of disagreeing with whatever the ruck of his fellow-undergraduates or fellow-countrymen consent about. And presently the war gives him his beautiful chance to demonstrate his quality. He protests against war in general, against England's going into this war, against English subjects fighting England's or anybody else's battle. Meanwhile Firbank drifts with the stream. For once the influence of patriotism or mob spirit or hysteria is stronger upon him than the influence of the mighty friend. Petronella's influence is, of course, upon the popular side. She triumphs for once in the failure of Murdoch, her rival, to turn Firbank his way. But she laughs too soon. The chronicler has no notion of letting the authority of his godling be flouted. Firbank becomes very much disgusted with the reality of war. He disapproves of the sights and sounds at the front; and as a disillusioned and temporarily invalided officer is easy game for the persistent Murdoch. Murdoch's moment of triumph comes when he calls to tell Petronella the facts of Firbank's death. Captain Firbank, on duty during the Easter Rebellion in Dublin, has betrayed his dislike for the whole business of the soldier, and has been shot by his men. This is unjust and altogether too bad, but, as Petronella says, there is no use in "seeking vengeance against individuals." This gives Murdoch his cue:

"No," said James. "It isn't the individual, it's the system. And the system is centuries behind modern thought, a horrible relic of the Dark Ages. As soon as the men of the present day reconquer their own mental liberty, the whole thing will fall to pieces. Democracy will then step forth unshackled—like a youthful giant!"

Peter covered her face with her hands, while James looked at her impassively out of his green-gray eyes. He knew what she was thinking, but he would not let her go until she had drained the cup which she and Harold had rejected two years back. . . .

"The saddest thing about Harold's death," he continued, "lay in the fact that not only was he on the wrong side—he knew it."

This, it appears, is not only sad but comforting to Petronella as well as to Murdoch. She parts from him with the promise that her son shall be brought up to hate all that his father has fought for. The only thing we miss in the pacifist Murdoch is the explicit belief in the disorganized and incidentally bloody business of worldwide Revolution which is to dispossess our capitalized militarism of its throne. But the war is still on when we lose sight of him.

One odd claim the publishers make for this story: that "the Irish question is here, for the first time, given adequate literary expression." Several recent novels have dealt as adequately (and inconclusively) with Britain's chronic ailment: for one, the "Changing Winds" of St. John Ervine, to which the present novel bears marked resemblance in material and personnel, down to the Easter Rebellion scene with which it closes—and from which it draws so different a moral.

H. W. BOYNTON

CANON BARNETT: His Life, Works and Friends. By Mrs. S. A. Barnett. Two volumes. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Company.

QUOUSQUE tandem? In this case it extends to near eight hundred pages, when a third of that space would have told us all we need to know about the good man whose life furnishes the subject, and would have left us entertained, perhaps even edified, instead of vexed with ennui and contradictions. How long shall biography in English remain the art of abusing patience? Canon Barnett, though a priest and a reformer, was no bore; why should his wife clothe piety in the long robes of tedium? For those who may be unfamiliar with his career it may be said that Samuel Augustus Barnett was born at Bristol in 1844, of sound evangelical stock. At the age of eighteen he went up to Oxford and was matriculated at Wadham College. He took no great part in the social life of the university, and indeed this part of the narrative (mirabile dictu) is altogether so brief as to be jejune. Shortly after graduation he traveled in America, with this result: "Born and nurtured in an atmosphere of Toreyism, what I saw and heard there knocked all the Toreyism out of me." Returning to Bristol he was ordained deacon, then priest, and in 1873 was appointed vicar of St. Jude's, Whitechapel. Meanwhile he had fallen under the influence of Miss Octavia Hill, an ardent social reformer, and through his long service at St. Jude's, indeed for the rest of his life, he devoted all his strength and talents, not to say genius, to bringing wholesome conditions, even religion, into the sodden existence of the outcast and the very poor. His great achievement was the creation of Toynbee Hall, as a college settlement primarily for Oxford men in the purlieu of Whitechapel. It was the first establishment of the kind (though something very like it had been foreshadowed in Besant's "All Sorts and Conditions of Men"), and from it sprang Hull House and a host of other such centres in British and American cities. In 1893, being old in deeds if not in years, he was made Canon of Bristol, and years later was transferred to Westminster Abbey. Though relieved from immediate participation in the life of the poor, he continued his work of reform, and as a cathedral preacher rather irritated some of his more comfortable hearers by reiterated insistence on social questions. He died in 1913.

Canon Barnett's was a life of utter devotion. Of his great foundation, the college settlement, we offer no criticism. Those who know our city slums are convinced that it has been the means of bringing something of light and joy into dark places; those who know our universities fear that the slant given to education by this intruded ideal of social service has not increased either the light or the joy in those places of supposed illumination. Most things in this tangled world are mingled of good and evil. In his methods of dealing with poverty and crime the Canon was sound and in some respects even austere. He was a vehement enemy of promiscuous charity, and the beggar, as beggar, was ejected summarily from his gates. Personally he was one who understood the varieties of the human heart, and much of his astonishing success was owing to his skill in penetrating character and setting his assistants to the right task. The callow graduate worked under him wisely, and the great men of London always found time to answer his call for help. It is a pity that the misguided piety of his wife and biographer has so overloaded her pages with repetitions and has constructed a story with so little arrangement and selection, that the hero's own character is half buried in extraneous matters, like the body of a rag-picker under his sacks.

Behind the Ranges

NEW RIVERS OF THE NORTH. By Hulbert Footner. New York: George H. Doran Company.

TO plunge into an uncharted wilderness, without guide or reliable information, to embark on unknown angry waters which may break into rapids or cataracts round the next bend is foolhardy, if the reader please, but the bright eyes of danger and the whisper that there is something behind the Ranges are irresistible lures to the true explorer. Such an adventure was undertaken by Mr. Hulbert Footner and his friend, Mr. Auville Eager, during the hot summer of 1911. The terra incognita they explored was the "last West" of Canada, the Peace River district; their goal was north of the sixtieth parallel.

From Edmonton they started along the new railway line westward, with limited stores of food, a letter of credit and a collapsible canvas boat christened Blunderbuss. Their route ran westward to the Yellowhead Pass; they covered the distance by rail and wagon. Once through the Pass, they entrusted themselves and their fortunes to their fragile cloth coracle and the turbulent waters of Mother Fraser. This remarkable river flows north for several hundred miles beside the Rockies before turning abruptly to the south to empty into the Gulf of Georgia. It runs with speed and has drowned many a man.

After braving the perils of this fierce stream, they portaged across to the headwaters of the Parsnip, a river running north like the Fraser, inside the mountains. Flowing from the north, the Friday meets the Parsnip; their junction forms the Peace River, which flows through the mountain pass of the same name eastward, then north and east, until it falls into Lake Athabasca.

They followed the course of the Peace

as far as Fort Vermilion, becoming more and more deeply impressed by the majesty of that noble river, growing ever greater through its affluents and falling through the rich lone land to lose itself in the inland sea. At Vermilion is a H. B. C. post. It is the most northerly point at which crops, vegetables, and flowers are grown. From this point, the explorers transported their boat, their supplies, and themselves in a northwesterly direction across fine park-like country to the Hay river, which flows north and empties into the Great Slave Lake.

Hay River had, up to this time, never been explored. In 1872, Bishop Bompas discovered the wonderful cataract in its course and named it Alexandra Falls, after the Princess of Wales. In 1887, R. G. McConnell, of the Canadian Geological Survey, explored it from the mouth to the falls. He estimated the height of the falls to be eighty-five feet as against the bishop's one hundred and fifty. They have been formed by the same conditions as Niagara, hard limestone over soft shales. The supporting shales are eroded and the limestone breaks away.

Alexandra Falls was the goal of these inland voyagers. Information on the subject was of the vaguest; map they had none. They could only find it by going with the current until they were swept over the brink, or discovered that the so-called cataract was only a series of bigger rapids. Down stream they went, not in Blunderbuss now, but Serpent, a heavy cottonwood dugout, with scanty supplies, and the season waning. At last, almost at the end of their tether, they came upon it.

As at Niagara the bordering cliffs rose perpendicularly, as if hewn by a single mighty stroke, but here they were of cream-colored stone instead of gray. Fragments fallen from above in the course of ages buttressed each cliff along its base, making a steep and narrow shore, which supported a line of spruces. These spruces, protected from the winds of the world and ceaselessly watered by the spray of the Falls, grew to a superb height and perfection of outline. The dark, rich green of the branches made a striking and harmonious combination with the creamy-yellow rock behind. Between the walls the brown river went down, embossed with a rococo design in soapy foam.

The reality was more wonderful than the anticipation. The sudden leap of the river down the gorge, after the flat tame country, was dramatic. Under the spell of the genius loci, the colloquial style of the narrative takes a higher turn; and the author's eloquence is justified by the excellent pictures of the cataract. Perhaps "Rivers of the North" will be remembered as the account of the very last exploration of new ground in North America.

DICKENS had a capacity for friendship which, by the double test of range and intensity, is probably unexampled. Sometimes he reminds us of the gentleman in "Our Mutual Friend" who described each new acquaintance as the dearest friend he had in the world without unseating any of the former occupants of that post. Dickens called this gentleman Veneering; we shall be kinder and more just toward Dickens. The effect of warmth is increased by the fact that all the friends whom Mr. J. T. Ley marshals through the four hundred pages of his "Dickens Circle" (Dutton) appropriate the Dickens manner when Dickens is the topic. He is like a broad fireplace in one of his own Maypoles or George-and-Dragons, which makes every pot and pan on which its light falls retort and reënforce the generative glow. The odd thing is that Dickens, the creator of diversities, should seem in these glowing mutualities to write always of one person and to one person. Thackeray and Lytton were opposites, yet if Dickens had written birthday notes to each and interchanged the envelopes, it is doubtful if he would have found anything to regret or revise in either missive.

Of course, these fusions have their inconveniences. If you love deeply one person whom you call Thackeray or Lytton or Macready or Proctor or Stone or Milnes or Irving or Felton according to the hat he chances to have on, you may be upset some day by the jolt of some unexpected difference. Dickens is rather prone to misunderstandings, even to estrangements. He has a difference with Thackeray—finally brought to an end—in which Mr. Ley himself concedes that Thackeray's position was unassailable. Mr. Ley thinks, nevertheless, that Thackeray never understood Dickens. This is a little puzzling. Thackeray surely was not the least penetrating of men, and Dickens of all men was apparently the most penetrable. He had a public, a shadeless, character; his mind was a piazza. He is the glorifier of the hearth, but his homes, bright and sweet as they are, have no intimacy. He had friendships in rich, almost in riotous, abundance, but the friendship which creates a recess for two people in the privacy of tacit understandings was perhaps beyond his grasp, beyond his guess. In the effort to picture an interior Dickens, a Dickens alone, the imagination is defeated. After all abatements he remains a rare soul and a precious influence, though it is curious that he has so largely lost his spell with a public still eagerly responsive to the qualities that formed that spell.

In "The Army Behind the Army" (Scribners), Major E. Alexander Powell gives a clear and entertaining account of all the special services. Thus the Signal Corps, the Engineers, Chemical Warfare, Supply, Ordnance, Aviation, Intelligence, the Tank Corps, the Motor Transport Corps, and the Hospital Corps receive perhaps for the first time a comprehensive recognition of their essential contribution toward victory. Many secret devices are described, among the most amazing a mechanical coder and decoder for the telephone or telegraph, which is to be spy-proof. Major Powell has seen all the services he describes, and treats them with knowledge, vivacity, and humor. He is the chronicler and not the critic of our military effort. The book, with its numerous instructive cuts, may be cordially recommended to all who wish to learn what military preparedness involves. We could wish that the author had pointed some obvious lessons as to our future military duty. Luck and circumstances hardly receive due recognition as ingredients in our success. Another time we might not be able to improvise a military establishment behind the friendly bayonets and battleships of other powers. That is what should be read between the lines of Major Powell's entertaining and informing chapters.

While Sir Henry Newboldt's little book, "Submarine and Anti-Submarine," published by Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co., is extremely interesting, the author (a member of the Council of the admirable Navy Records Society of Great Britain) labors under the disadvantage of having written it during the war. In consequence, some of the most important measures against the German U-boats adopted by the Allies are not touched upon, doubtless through fear of "aiding the enemy." For example, no mention is made of the value, in this connection, of the airplane or the wireless direction compass. Although telling little new, his well-written short stories of the thrilling operations of British submarines in the Baltic and the Sea of Marmora; of the work of the merchant sailor in trawlers, smacks, and drifters; of the "Q" or "mystery boats," and the like, make the volume well worth reading and preserving. The German successes are yet to be told in authoritative detail. Until then, it will be difficult to strike a balance of conservative appreciation. Sir Henry's opening chapter, "The Spirit of Submarine War," and his accounts of the inhuman brutality of the Huns afloat would alone condemn the latter for generations to come as wholly undeserving of any sympathy or forbearance.

What Are My Politics?

AS a returned soldier, I have recently tried to do some thinking about my politics. I want to feel that, politically, I "belong"—chiefly for my own peace of mind. I want to have a stake in the country, and for one thing I am going to go slow with what radical inclinations I have until I've got it. There isn't much glory in being a radical if you haven't anything to lose, and besides, it doesn't seem on the level.

I don't know exactly what I want in a party, but I do know that I want something on the level. Everybody, of course, wants something on the level, but personally I never felt the special value of that quality before I went into the army and I believe I feel it now so very strongly because I have been in the army. Why is that? Probably because my helplessness under the army rules and regulations made me feel so dependent on the character and will of my commanding officer and because a just commanding officer helped me to preserve my self-respect. You are apt to feel a little down-trodden in the army, but if your C. O. is honestly trying to be square and sensible in the way he applies the rules, you feel less down-trodden; you feel that failure or success is entirely up to you. That is one reason, I think, why "on the level" takes on a new meaning. There is something about the army, too, that shows men up beyond anything in civil life; socially the army makes its own laws, and there is no quality, when you get right close up, that you count on more than fairness.

Of course, that brings it down to a matter of persons more than party. As far as a "soldier vote" goes, if there is one after this war, I believe it will be a matter of persons with the soldier. I think as a soldier you believe intensely in the man, probably too much so. That has been my experience. But, then, you are so dependent on personality. Just the same, if this on-the-level thing is a touchstone of what I want, it can be applied, I think, to parties and movements as well as men.

I can't see myself with the Republicans, though I was a great Republican as a kid. They are too completely for the wealthy and the "nice people." The virtue about them is that they get things done, that they don't have an extra lot of hypocrisy, and that they are regular fellows, even if sometimes in the worst sense.

The trouble with the Democrats is that they are not regular fellows even in the best sense. They seem to me to have run the war somewhat as though they were the Ladies' Aid Society. They would say, "That was splendid!" instead of "Good work!" Most of this feeling is prejudice, of course, and not worth much even in a meditation. They do seem to be the nearest to trying to be on the level. Only I wish they were simpler and knew more. I don't believe it would have made much difference in the army what party was in power, but since getting out of the army it seems to me that everywhere I have run against the public service it's been so poor and bad-natured that I have felt I wanted to help boot the Administration out.

While I believe that Bolshevism is a lemon, there are good things in radicalism that get condemned along with it. The trouble is that we are apt to get a lot of emotion out of a fine Americanism of long ago, simple and dignified and truly democratic, that does not exist now; and this makes us hostile to and uninterested in the problems of the newer Americans who make up so much of our labor, whom we use but want to curse out because they don't seem to appreciate the privilege of being Americans, when probably we are just as bum Americans ourselves. We certainly are that if we haven't got good will and simplicity, but merely rustle for money to buy fine clothes and cars and give our children snobbish ideas in place of well-bred ones.

The thing that gets me so sore, not only at Bolshevism but at the Radicals and Socialists, is that I don't think they have good will or that they have been on the level about the war. The war seemed to me a clear-cut issue between decency and indecency, between a fairly liberal and well-meaning civilization and a tyrannous and evilly disposed Power. All other questions, even the most poignant social questions within the different countries, I think, became nothing alongside of this struggle. Even if there wasn't this issue, the behavior of Germany in Belgium and France, the carrying off of women and girls, to speak of nothing else, would suffice to line up everyone against her on a straight-out human basis. To blink at an issue like this and concentrate on militarism or the rights and wrongs of the working classes, the freedom of Ireland, or the revolution in Russia seems to me to indicate that the revolutionaries are class creatures first and human beings afterward. I can't help feeling in their lack of decent indignation against the German outrages that the spirit of tyranny is not uncongenial to them at bottom. As the war has shown them up I don't believe they want an even break in life, but want to impose their order of things autocratically.

At the same time, I ask myself, Aren't the big social issues and questions of the future, the ones that are coming and may be near, those very questions that the revolutionaries are so excited about, even if they have an ugly way of looking at them. Don't they demand a good deal of special knowledge as well as intelligence in the men who are to be in power? Is there any one that we talk about for office, or is any of the old parties primed enough with brains to meet these questions without making fools of themselves?

These thoughts bring me—where? I am sure of one thing: that I should have to change a lot before internationalism would seem the right thing, any more than "inter-familyism." I should like to see a healthy American solidarity, with an even-eyed feeling towards the rest of the world: no idea of holding a lamp aloft for the peoples—that's trying to put it over on them—but a good, worldly, neighborhood feeling with a normal sense of family privacy. Why isn't that good business as the basis of a foreign policy?

With ourselves, the main thing is to love justice and to have sense, and I suppose I mean by sense in connection with government that we can't rip things out of our life that have our feelings and beliefs all twined tightly around them, but we can begin to quit thinking in class ways, or what comes first, maybe, quit acting like classes. We can think of work as the law, as somebody said, and allow all work its dignity. I don't think that is capitalist bunk. The French have that dignity naturally, to judge from what I saw in the villages: girls wheeling laundry and garden truck in wheelbarrows with their forearms swollen like laborers but with their hair done up daintily and trim-waisted and quick-footed. They looked at you frankly and proudly and said, "Bon jour, Monsieur!" with a bright smile. In the army, too, you learn that overalls don't make any difference. You may get a ration detail or a K. P. job and look like sloppy weather all day, but you get all flossed up in the evening and breeze around to the canteen as good as anybody who works in the orderly room. To think of all men as your brothers and to make your politics like that; not to uplift so much as to get in with. Look for the party, I'm telling myself, that has the most on-the-level spirit of that sort. I believe there is more real social purpose in one like that than in all the class or socializing parties according to formula. They can't fight and smile. I think it is a deadly score against them. Maybe the party I am looking for is the Salvation Army. Something like their spirit might get into a political party. It's the kind of thing the soldier would go for.

A RETURNED SOLDIER

Drama

Critic and Manager

THE PRINCIPLES OF PLAYMAKING. By Brander Matthews. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

THE THEATRE THROUGH ITS STAGE DOOR. By David Belasco. New York: Harper & Brothers.

I LIKE Mr. Matthews best in the later and lighter papers in which he is not drawing up a charter for drama. Among the soundest and timeliest of the sixteen essays is "Shakespearian Stage-Traditions," a plea for the conservation in writing of that order of stage-business in Shakespeare of which tradition—flighty and shiftless tradition—is now the curator. "Hamlet with Hamlet Left Out" is a bright assemblage of examples of plays in which the leading personage, like the monster in Mr. O'Brien's famous story, is potent but invisible. "Irish Plays and Irish Playwrights" is a documented and valuable record of the shyness and hesitancy of Irish dramatists in the grapple with Irish themes. The "Simplification of Stage-Scenery" is an admirably judicious summary of an intricate and tantalizing situation. In "Matthew Arnold and the Theatre" the sanity of Arnold's mind, even in a topic which his genius barely flicked, is refreshingly evident. In the final paper, "Memories of Edwin Booth," the memories are few but firm; each fact is cut like a die; there is none of that "unnumbered, idle pebble" of trivialities or that gravel of unassorted reminiscence into which recitals of this kind are so prone to deteriorate.

I like Mr. Matthews less as doctrinaire and legislator in the "Principles of Playmaking" and the ensuing and related essays. He shows indeed, here as everywhere, his strong traits, an acquisitive vigor of the first order, and a faculty for classifying or coördinating facts of which the range is as notable as the facility. He has a mind in which ideas convene; they find the accommodations liberal. His mind has a mass and sinew which fits it for the seizure of dramatic values. Drama is no meat for invalids or diletanti. Drama is a bluff, stout, burly, insensitive, half-savage thing, which becomes literary, or poetical, or psychological, or profound only by a transformation or subjugation of its own nature. I concur with Mr. Matthews in the virilities of his judgment, in his emphasis on performance, in his view of the playhouse as the playwright's academy, in his hatred of a drama that is merely plastered with literature. I even agree with him, against Mr. Archer, with whom I am rather fond of agreeing, that action, not character, is primary and basic in drama. But he has the defects of his qualities. His love for certified, solidified, and marshalled facts, and his removedness from intuitions have led him greatly to overrate the part played by disciplined knowledge, and greatly to minimize the part played by intuitive perception, in the composition of successful dramas. He fails to realize the tremendous part which a mode of perception, intuitive in its form and therefore not to be taught, but experiential in its basis and therefore undoubtedly to be acquired, plays in the dramatist's constructive process. Drama craves an educated instinct; Mr. Matthews wants a code.

In one respect, however, his mind is self-corrective. His conversation with the theatre, the playhouse, has been intimate for many years, and he is fortunate in the ownership of a mind in which theory does not garble observation. He would like the unqualified generality; he would say, if he could: "Never keep a secret from your audience." But as candid playgoer he sees that the dramatist may keep a secret from his audience, to his profit and their pleasure. Mr. Matthews wanted truths that should be universal and teachable; he finds, to his distress, that the teachabilities are contingent. He will not quite forsake his cherished universals; he retreats upon the curious and difficult position that the universalities, though absolute, are inscrutable. He talks about the "difficulty of perceiving the eternal principles" (page 9), about "principles of dramatic construction, whatever they may be" (page 6; italics mine). Now, right as Mr. Matthews is in broadening the scope of contingency, his recourse, in self-defense, to an impalpable sovereignty, an anchorite principle, a principle not to be coaxed out of its grot or lair, is only temporizing. A principle, in the constructive arts if nowhere else, is a utensil, and a utensil that you can not grasp is an anomaly without place either in logic or nature.

The meagreness of the teachable element in playmaking is evinced in the emphasis on commonplaces. Mr. Matthews finds it instructive to say that dramas should be fitted to audiences. In a lecture on babies' food, would he find it instructive to be told that the food in question should be adapted to babies, not to hussars or hippopotami? Is he trying to inhibit the closet drama? Mr. Matthews has a rather peculiar attitude toward the closet drama, which he despises as if it were impotent and hates as if it were powerful. But the closet drama, being in the closet, will not trouble us. The prevention of that kind of trouble is exactly what closets are for.

Mr. Belasco's seven essays make up a frank, informal, interesting hook. The first essay, the "Theatre through its Stage Door," contains that sort of admo-nation to actors which is very valuable to the very ignorant. Toward the movies, which he rather wittily calls the "Drama's Flickering Bogy," the author is benevolently contemptuous. He is equally contemptuous and less benevolent toward impressionism in stage-scenery; Mr. Gordon Craig has done little more than "ventilate his fantastic theories in an inexplicable book" (page 234).

Mr. Belasco is far from ignoring the actor. In the "Problem of the Child Actor," he has the disinterestedness to put the good of the child before the good of the stage, but thinks that the stage is a better environment for the child than the environment which it usually replaces. The man in Mr. Belasco appears to be unusually kind; only the artist is merciless. He has much to say of Mrs. Leslie Carter and Miss Frances Starr. The charge of dragging Mrs. Carter by the hair and beating her head against the furniture he peremptorily denies, but he is almost self-complacent in his confession that in the effort to extort an adequate shriek from Miss Starr in the "Easiest Way" he taunted and goaded her till she dropped in a swoon. He obtained his shriek, but sense and humanity both join Miss Starr in the vehemence of her outcry. Parrhasius, a Greek painter, in a once familiar poem by N. P. Willis, tortured a slave in his studio that he might verify and intensify the muscular contortions on his canvas. Mr. Belasco is perhaps sufficiently censured in the fact that his defense would have been available to Parrhasius. The painter doubtless made his victim famous.

Mr. Belasco, in "Important Aids to the Actor's Art" (a diplomatic title), denies that he is a mere technician. "The use of color, not for mere adornment but to convey a message to the hearts of audiences, has become my creed" (page 165). The sincerity of this is evident, and its truth is probable. One might ask, indeed, why Mr. Belasco is so copious on the mechanism and so laconic on the message, why a mechanism so subtle illustrates a psychology so ingenuous. "I set the stage in the picture of a gaunt bamboo forest, behind which was a great blood-red sun to symbolize ebbing day" (page 58). The exegesis in the last four words is not wrong, not dull; it might serve as a beginning; with Mr. Belasco it is the stopping-place. Again, when one surveys this elaboration of spectacle by which Mr. Belasco has almost literally dazzled his public, one is not sure of its necessity. Is the human heart so impenetrable? Are not the obvious means of penetration more powerful than the subtle ones? There is another mechanism available which an artist even more resolute than Belasco has perfected through an immeasurably longer and more strenuous probation. That

Mr. Belasco does not slight that mechanism; on the contrary he loves, values, studies, fashions it. But I doubt if his homage, though great, is great in the measure of its claims, is commensurate with its real predominance. The points in voice and gesture which apparently interest him most, are the arduous points, points like Miss Starr's shriek, difficulties which nothing less than a campaign will overcome. They indicate the temper which loves to triumph even more than to excel. That temper, in another aspect, is Mr. Belasco's greatness. The papers on the "Evolution of a Play" and "Developing the Best in the Actor" have that very real value which belongs to every unaffected record of the victories of perseverance. David Belasco may not have the elevation of an artist, but he has the morale of an artist, and morale, in art or soldiership, is half the battle. The indomitable is our salvation; on any plane it is inspiring; the day will come when it will climb upstairs.

Books and the News Children's Books

READERS may care to turn from the books upon serious problems which usually are mentioned here, and consider the purchase of books for Christmas gifts to children. The children's department of the New York Public Library has an exhibition of such books, and the titles mentioned in this article are chosen from the exhibition. All of these are of 1919 publication; many of them new books, the others are holiday editions of old favorites.

Among the beautifully illustrated books "The Boyd Smith Mother Goose" (Putnam) is notable, illustrated in color and in black and white by the artist who has made so many delightful books for children. "A Journey to the Garden Gate" (Houghton), by Ralph M. Townsend, with colored pictures by Milo Winter, is fanciful adventure on the order of Alice in Wonderland. George MacDonald's well-liked story, "At the Back of the North Wind" (McKay), has been adorned with pictures by Jessie Willcox Smith. Translations from the Countess D'Aulnoy are given in "The Children's Fairy-Land" (Holt), with silhouettes by Harriet Olcott. Some amusing rhymes, similar to Edward Lear's, and good to read aloud to small children, are "Inklings and Thinklings" (Marshall Jones Co.), by Susan Hale, with her own pictures. "Czechoslovak Fairy Tales" (Harcourt), retold by Parker Fillmore, are

GRANVILLE

Tales and Tail Spins from a Flyer's Diary

The literature of the War will contain many records of the achievements of our men over seas, but there will be little told of the brave host of youth, who, anxious to sacrifice self to a great ideal, spent months in the training camps of America, drilling, studying, instructing their fellow soldiers, and bending every effort toward taking an active part in the fighting. This unique book tells the story of the making of a soldier in one branch of the service, and gives an uncolored, intimate account of the experiences and thoughts of one of the youth who helped to win the war over here. It is edited from his diary and, in deference to the wishes of the family, is published anonymously.

STAR DUST FROM THE DUGOUTS

A Reconstruction Book

By WILLIAM L. STIGER

The boy in the trenches heralds the boy at home! The author, who on the battlefields of France won the title of The Fighting Parson, has seen a vision, he is following the gleam, and turns its light into these pages. A reconstruction book written with sympathy and authority. Stidger's latest and best. A challenging interpretation.

THE CHRONICLE OF AN OLD TOWN

By A. B. CUNNINGHAM

The underlying idea of The Chronicle of an Old Town is the reaction of a leisurely disposition to the mechanical hurrying tendency of modern life. As one reads this easy and delightful chronicle it is as though Hawthorne had come back and sauntered with us through the old town, making us acquainted with its interesting folks and ways. The author refuses to be in haste; his story just grows as he tells us of the minister and his family, the village people, and the love affairs of some of them. Quaint philosophy, quiet humor, and close character sketching make this a book quite out of the ordinary. It has a style and charm all its own, leisurely to the last degree, yet never allowing the attention to wander.

GEORGE WASHINGTON THE CHRISTIAN

By WILLIAM J. JOHNSON

A companion volume to Abraham Lincoln the Christian. The wide interest in Dr. Johnson's first volume created a demand for a similar book about George Washington, and here it is. This compilation of documents from original sources sheds new light on the sterling character of our first President. It will be welcomed by all students of biography and history.

THE UTTERMOST STAR

And Other Gleams of Fancy

By F. W. BOREHAM

MR. BOREHAM has for twenty years or more spent his life among the mountains of Scotland and Australia. His books are already well known in England, and a large number of Americans are daily becoming acquainted with him. His subjects are of a wide range, and each one is treated with beauty and distinction. The happy high-heartedness of him is so infectious that to read him is a sheer delight. There are no barbed-wire entanglements of formal rhetoric or ambitious style about him. Reading his books, one is in immediate touch with a mind that is mel- low, quaint, and richly original.

suitably illustrated by Jan Matulka. Humorous rhymes, excellently illustrated, are in "News from Notown" (Houghton), by Eleanor and Lucy Perkins.

Five good books combine instruction with amusement. These are, first, two about airplanes: "The Boys' Airplane Book" (Stokes), by A. Frederick Collins, with technical information about making planes; and "The Romance of Aircraft" (Stokes), by Laurence Y. Smith. The admirable 'Burgess Bird Book for Children' (Little), by Thornton Burgess, is written in an attractive style, has been commended by naturalists for accuracy, and is further enhanced by Mr. Fuertes's colored pictures. Maeterlinck's famous work has been adapted, with colored pictures, as "The Children's Life of the Bee" (Dodd). A juvenile work on American government is "The Land of Fair Play" (Scribner), by Geoffrey Parsons.

For longer "story-books," which will not be read through before bed-time on Christmas, there is E. F. Benson's "David Blaize and the Blue Door" (Doran), with its imaginary adventure, somewhat in the manner of Carryl's inimitable "Davy and the Goblin." Four books about the war are W. A. Dyer's "Ben, the Battle Horse" (Holt), Mary Du Bois's "Comrade Rosalie" (Century), Flavia Canfield's "The Refugee Family; a Story for Girls" (Harcourt), and Emilie and Alden Knipe's "Vive la France!" (Century). A tale of an earlier era is Alsheler's "The Sun of Quebec" (Appleton). "Wee Ann" (Houghton), by Ethel Phillips, is "a story for little girls," while Joseph Jacobs, in "The Book of Wonder Voyages" (Putnam), retells myths and early legends. A kind of new Jungle Book, but dealing with animals and children of the North, is Olaf Baker's "Shasta of the Wolves" (Dodd), with Mr. Bull's fine pictures. Other children, besides the fortunate ones who first read them, will enjoy "Theodore Roosevelt's Letters to His Children" (Scribner). In "The Book of Bravery" (Scribner), H. W. Lanier has made a second and excellent collection of true stories of heroism. Two books, also for older children, are "Joan of Arc" (Appleton), by Laura E. Richards, and "A Childhood in Brittany Eighty Years Ago" (Century), by Anne Sedgwick.

MR. LANSING'S reply to the Mexican Government's note on the Jenkins case is a prolix and unimpressive document. If our grievance against Mexico in this affair is no clearer or graver than appears from this statement, nothing could be more unfortunate than that this particular matter should be made the basis of a serious clash between the two countries. The tone of the Mexican note was, indeed, highly objectionable; but Carranza should not be permitted to manoeuvre us into the position of making a mountain out of a molehill after years of persistent endeavor to make molehills out of mountains. If the whole character of the Mexican situation is such that the time has at last arrived when we must take a peremptory stand, some way should be found to make that fact patent to all fair-minded men. To tie the issue up with a quarrel over the question whether Mr. Jenkins should be compelled to give $500 bail pending a trial of the charge against him, or should be released without bail, would be one of the worst errors of tactics imaginable. How to deal with the case, in its present stage, without compromising the Government's dignity, and yet avoid making it the ostensible cause of a breach between the two countries is a difficult problem, to be sure; but it is precisely this kind of problem that diplomacy—as distinguished from argumentative note-writing—is under the most imperative obligation to solve.

THE indictment of Senator Newberry and 133 other persons, many of them prominent citizens of Michigan, for corruption, fraud, and conspiracy in connection with the election which put Mr. Newberry into the Senate, should lead to a fixed determination on the part of the public that the legislation of the last two decades for the prevention of such practices shall be made effective for that end. Upon the question of criminality opinion must, of course, be suspended until the evidence is in and the case duly decided by the courts. But that there has been a scandalous misuse of money, whether illegal or not, seems hardly doubtful.

Whatever the outcome of the judicial proceedings, the case must serve as a warning that, in spite of all that has been done since the campaign of 1896 centred the nation's attention on the question, we are far from having reached the condition which we have a right to demand in which we have a right to demand in the matter of the purity of elections. We should be much nearer that point, so far as Congress is concerned, if House and Senate could be counted on to fulfil in a judicial spirit the duty that rests upon them in the case of disputed elections. The Constitution makes each house "the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." But al-

The British House of Commons long ago discarded this mode of deciding election disputes. They are referred to the courts, and a judicial decision establishing fraud automatically deprives the member who has profited by it of his seat. In view of the provision in our own Constitution, we have to rely on such pressure as public opinion can bring to bear for a fair adjudication in Congress—a reliance that has thus far proved a very feeble one—and upon such deterrent force as criminal prosecution may afford. In this last direction there is no reason why we should not introduce real effectiveness, and the Department of Justice has a chance in the Newberry case of showing its mettle. That its exertions are invoked in behalf of such a ridiculous aspirant to a seat in the Senate as Mr. Ford is unfortunate, but of course it has nothing to do with the case.

IN one respect, the Soviet Government has shown ability, and that is in its military organization. Its methods of rule have not changed and there is no sign of any constructive ability to meet with production the needs of the millions who cower under its tyranny. Word has gone forth from Moscow that an effort is being made to form a coalition with the Socialist Revolutionaries and there is implied a promise to make the government in some sense representative. But it is evident on the face of it that this is merely intended to deceive and cajole the outside world.

The military successes of the Bolsheviki should be more disquieting to the world at large than to Russians. No matter what the immediate outcome in Russia itself, there can be little doubt that sooner or later power will be taken over by the disillusioned Russians themselves. But the rest of Europe is in a state singularly susceptible to the Red Plague, and Bolshevik victories in Russia, joined with the failures of Allied policy, are fanning the flames of revolution in Central and Eastern Europe.

Meanwhile, the Bolshevik campaign of insinuating and lying propaganda goes on apace, and we are but slowly appreciating its menace in America and in Asia. In this connection a paragraph from "Soviet Russia" is fraught with sinister meaning:

The Russian workmen and peasants have overpowered the capitalistic armies of the whole world, and their Asiatic neighbors are watching their brilliant victory with astonishment and admiration. They understand well that in Soviet Russia they cannot behold the same black menace as in imperialistic Russia. They now look on Soviet Russia as on a giant who may protect them from their European oppressors and they hold out their hands toward this giant with the cry: We are with you! The approachment of Soviet Russia and Afghanistan is a great event in the history of Asiatic nations. We are prepared to see in this approachment the first step toward a new Euro-Asiatic combination, which may in the future decide the destinies of the old degenerated Europe.

When one realizes that the methods of the Bolsheviks are those of lying, treachery, bribery and corruption, and that they stop at no crime to achieve their end, it is possible to sense the menace expressed in this paragraph.

EVERYBODY, here and in England, seems glad that Lady Astor won her seat in Parliament. The feeling is general that she earned it. Her campaign gained for her the golden opinion of being a "reg'lar feller." Speculation now turns on what she will do with her hat—a very plain one. If her campaign is any guarantee of the future she will not use her hat, as too many legislators of the other sex have done, as the vehicle of her oratory. Nor does she seem of the sort likely to shed tears on any provocation whatever. The "Plymouth Mother" should not be long in making a home for herself in the "Mother of Parliaments." The working out of the experiment can for the present, however, be safely left in her hands.

"THE Italian Socialist leaders, after a long discussion, passed a resolution characterizing the Socialist election success as an act of complete solidarity with the Russian Soviet Republic," says a special cable to the Christian Science Monitor. The most interesting part of this bit of news is the fact that a long discussion was necessary for the leaders to arrive at this decision. Had the majority not made up their minds as to their own relations with the third Internationale of Moscow? Or did the discussion bear on the advisability of such a pronunciamento from the point of view of national politics? Forewarned is forearmed. The other parties will only be the stronger, because more inclined to

The French comrades are better tacticians than Machiavelli's countrymen seem to be. "There need be no fear of Bolshevism, which now means what radicalism meant in 1872," said Léon Blum, a socialist member of the Chamber of Deputies, in an interview with the Havas Agency. The Longuet of to-day is, apparently, an avatar of yesterday's Clemenceau. And isn't the Tiger a harmless animal? Tigers in Paris are not what tigers are in India. Lenin himself, said M. Blum, would have acted differently in France. He would, no doubt, have done what M. Blum said his party proposes to do: wait until "the socialist organization shall have reached the interior of society and attained a sufficient degree of maturity." The Soviet incubus of Moscow has evidently failed as an incubator, and, taught by the Russian experiment, the French Bolsheviks will employ time instead. In other words, Bolshevik revolution in France will be evolution, a process as imperceptible and gentle as the maturing of the radical Clemenceau of 1872 into the conservative of 1919.

THE constitution of a Coalition Cabinet in Hungary is a diplomatic success for Sir George Clerk, the emissary of the Supreme Council. The former Premier Stephan Friedrich, an ardent royalist and reactionary, has yielded to the ultimatum handed him by Sir George on November 11, in which he was notified that a Coalition Cabinet must be formed within forty-eight hours, or he must retire from the membership. The time limit was exceeded by twelve days, but compared to Rumania's tardiness in reacting to ultimatums from Paris, this may be called prompt compliance on Minister Friedrich's part. The new Premier, Karl Huszar, is a Christian Nationalist, and has given the majority of the portfolios to politicians of his own conviction. About a fortnight ago Minister Friedrich said, in a public speech, that a majority of the Hungarian people were royalist and wished their king back on the throne. The fresh experiment with communist rule must have converted many a half-hearted radical to monarchism. Karl Huszar's immediate task will be to send a delegation to Paris, fully authorized to sign the peace treaty with the Entente. His next may be the restoration of the monarchy, an event which is not likely to meet with disapproval from the side of France and England as long as the candidate to the throne is not King Ferdinand of Rumania. The constitution of a new Dual Monarchy is the ambitious dream of M. Bratiano, but the military rule of the Rumanians during their occupation of Hungary was little calculated to make the Hungarians favor a political union with Bucharest.

SOUND common sense dominated at the annual meeting of the International Farm Congress, as reported in the November issue of the Agricultural Review. The Congress grew out of the consolidation of two earlier organizations, the Irrigation Congress and the Dry-Farming Congress. The resolutions, adopted with great enthusiasm and apparently without opposition, began with a proud reference to increased farm production during the war and a pledge to continue to produce in such measure as to meet any emergency. While expressing friendship and good will towards all kinds of labor, they deplored the turbulent conditions existing in the ranks of organized labor, and protested strongly against its attempts to curtail production, while demanding a more bountiful food supply of the farmer. Loyal workmen are called upon, in view of generally unsettled conditions growing out of the war, to join with loyal farmers in exerting a steadying influence, nationally and internationally, and specifically "the calling of strikes in times like these for any other reason than a grave emergency" was deplored. And the farmers at Kansas City further declared themselves without qualification as opposed to the unionization of policemen or other officials in public employ.

THESE resolutions get their importance, under present conditions, from the fact that they are the expression of the thought of a vast body of men who do not classify sharply with either the laborer or the employer, as these two classes are ordinarily conceived of in our large cities, or in manufacturing, mining and transportation centres. The great majority of farmers are both laborers with their hands and employers. In the farmer's case, then, the impression of present world conditions falls upon minds not obviously subject by habit or self-interest either to the capitalist's or the laborer's bias. It is reassuring to find that in so widely representative a convention of men of this class revolutionary radicalism excites no reaction but that of repulsion. "If the conservative and loyal element of organized labor still possesses the judgment and foresight heretofore credited to it," says the Agricultural Review in its editorial comment, "it will read the signs of the times correctly, and exert every possible effort to check the Bolshevistic influence within its ranks. The resolutions adopted by the Fourteenth International Farm Congress constitute a warning that cannot be misunderstood."

The "Passion for Justice"

IN one of Bernard Shaw's plays a burglar enters the home of a capitalist and, when asked what he is after, says he wants justice. "Justice!" exclaims the capitalist; "well, you can't have it. Justice is the last thing in this world that people get." Mr. Shaw has only added a touch of cynicism to the common-sense judgment which has all along known that this is true. Like "self-determination," justice when scrutinized too closely turns coquette and refuses to reveal her true self. The great problem for us is to create conditions in which justice may feel at home. Unfortunately, even in this new after-war world of ours, popular agreement on this score is far from achieved. The intellectual radicals are trying to make a fairy godmother of justice and are rounding up Cinderellas for her to work on. To satisfy conservatives she should be somewhat sterner than stern Portia. The liberals might imagine her as a winsome personage of honesty and tact. Is it any wonder that she has grown to be all things to all men?

The intellectual radicals have created the impression that they are the only group which possesses a passion for justice. They have discarded the old doctrine of "mine and thine"—in which economics is seen combined with ethics—for a mystic marriage of economics and religion. What their system of economics is it is difficult to determine. The radicals, while careful not to commit themselves to the principle of state socialism, are preoccupied with economic measures which could operate under no other system of government. Intellectually, they would be more honest if they came out frankly for state socialism; but by so doing they would lose many of their glowing adherents, who are stirred by a programme of reform when it is sufficiently vague.

Whether planted in them by heaven or by their own temperaments, radicals at any rate start with the fixed idea that the "plain people" must govern the earth, and then associate themselves with all organizations which by any stretch of the imagination offer them the possibility of a righteous brotherhood of man. That accounts for their tender treatment of the Bolsheviks. They hold no brief for these persons, Oh, no. But they say that "cold, naked, starving, dying Russia clings to an idea, while the Allied Governments fight that idea with the sword and the blockade, and the Government of the United States ostentatiously washes its hands in the presence of the multitude," and will endure no harsh criticism of them. The steel strike, the coal strike, the activities of the I. W. W. bring to their spines the romantic shiver, and the lyric note bursts forth: "This is the revolution. We stand in its presence, understanding not whence it cometh or whither it goeth."

The real test of the intellectual radicals must be sought in their more sober words. If the spirit by which they are actuated is a passion for real justice, and not a romantic striving for the unattainable, we shall expect to find them dealing truthfully with facts, avoiding inferences which are manifestly false, and anxious to help a deserving underdog—even if he happens to be a thoroughbred.

The New Republic, in a recent editorial advising labor to form a political party of its own, argues the case of the workingman with what the writer doubtless persuades himself as well as his readers is the glow of righteous conviction. Half truths, under his skilful handling, shine forth like flaming moral lessons. The text is the mistreatment accorded labor since the war, and this is in effect the argument: Labor coöperated loyally with the Government during the war, its representatives sat on important national commissions, and were even used as emissaries to Europe. Therefore, organized labor had a right to expect that its principles (collective bargaining, the closed shop), its hours, its wages, would be immediately adopted, with Government help, and that labor in some fashion would acquire a new place in the control of industry. Nothing is said about the time and energy given by capitalists and clerks to war activities. Only labor unions are to be rewarded for loyalty; and they should receive without discussion the right to impose conditions over which controversy has raged ever since the advent of the union. We are told that labor unionists "are the only important group in America which is remaining true to the national traditions of fair play, free discussion and government by the consent of the governed," although Mr. Gompers himself at first refused to sanction the steel strike because the majority of the workers were opposed to it. We hear that the public is indifferent to the merits of strikes, though it must be known to New Republic editors that for decades the tendency of the public has almost uniformly been to side with the strikers. The New Republic refuses to prejudice the case of the strikers by admitting that just at present, owing to the activities of Reds all over the country and even in the ranks of labor, the public has good ground for alarm over labor's sweeping demands.

The New Republic will not admit that labor made a tactical mistake by attempting to inaugurate its semi-revolutionary programme so soon after the cessation of hostilities, when the task of getting back to a sound civil government was beset with difficulties. It draws the conclusion that the Government and the public have broken faith with labor. The Nation utters the same wail: "The course of the Government . . . serves to confirm the unfortunate suspicions of workingmen that in the real test the Government is the organ of the propertied classes." The New Republic disarms the reader's possible criticism that labor, in the present crisis, may be thinking exclusively of its own interest by a sneer at capitalists: Labor unionists "must beware of following the vicious example of the employing group, of yielding to the dangers and tempting psychology of industrial warfare." Because of the injunction brought against the chiefs of the coal miners, the same paper characterizes the Clayton act as "the most perfect example of a gold brick ever passed off by politicians on a group of credulous victims." Again not a word about the vast damage inflicted upon others than labor unionists by the present war-time conditions—the brewers, for instance, who, like the coal miners, are the victims of a technicality, and the whole tribe of railroad stockholders. The whole article is instinct with a "passion for justice"—abstract justice to be applied exclusively to one group of individuals! And yet the New Republic would hotly resent the charge that it and its kind are doing more than the "capitalist press" to create class antagonism.

The Nation has a proud past to fall back upon, and makes the most of it, for it has the hardihood to pretend that it has not departed from the spirit of the Nation of Godkin's day. These tactics began two years ago. In its issue of December 27, 1917, after insinuating a strong leaning toward socialism by the amazing statement that "Denmark is today a more completely socialized state than Karl Marx dreamed of," and by other sentences of a similar sort, it coolly said: "As for the Nation, it sees nothing in the present situation to cause it to change its attitude towards socialism." And then it quoted the following words of a former editor: "And as for other questions—we cannot believe that error will permanently prevail over truth. We are confident that individualism, in its main features, is the policy which has formed and which must preserve our institutions. But if we conservatives are mistaken we cannot but welcome a discussion which shall open our eyes and set us right. Our attitude towards this topic, as towards any other which touches the vitals of our nation, must be that of readiness to defend our faith in open forum, to meet and conquer reason with reason." To use Hammond Lamont's declaration of honest warfare as a cover for the policy of promoting socialism by every means short of open avowal—to try to make two things seem the same which are as different as possible—is a kind of thing in which the present-day Nation has developed a curious, if ineffective, expertness.

On November 1, fulminating against the treaty, the Nation cried out, "no one shall ever say of The Nation that it consented to its country's dishonor." But when the Bolsheviki were surrendering their country to Germany, it burst forth with the salutation, "All hail, free Russia!" When the United States, quite within the bounds of well-established international law, requisitioned the Dutch ships, it railed, "If we must win this war by adopting the principle that might is right, let us prate no more of moral justifications, let us weep no more tears for Belgium and Serbia." In the dark days of February, 1918, it placed before its readers the cheering thought that famine was "The Only Advancing General." At the end of 1917, while admitting that "Germany's peace terms are a confession that she is at the end of her resources, and knows herself beaten and humbled," it drew so dark a picture of the Allied prospects as to justify the conclusion that "wise statesmen would be guilty, indeed, if they did not inquire if an honorable peace—not a pro-German one—is possible at the present time." To urge one's country to balk at hardships in a conflict as to which there was no longer any question which side was in the right, and to blind one's country to the mammoth distinction between the requisitioning of the Dutch ships and Germany's organized frightfulness in Belgium, are poor ways of safeguarding the country's honor.

The Dial, which in February, 1918, suggested as the proper reconstructors of the world, among others, Lenin and Trotsky, has in its issue of November 15, 1919, an editorial, prompted by the anniversary of armistice day, which is written, one may say, from the point of view of a cheated Bolshevik. The argument is as follows: "Guardians of the Vested Interests," without a thought of saving humanity from further bloodshed, negotiated a hasty peace in order "to avert a collapse of the German military organization" and the "German Imperial organization." This would have impaired the "vested interests of property and class rule" in the Entente. The Lansdowne letters—those precious documents formerly hailed with such delight by radicals—now prove to have been the voice of alarmed, organized capitalists. A further three months of the war would have left Germany in no position to be a bulwark against Bolshevism, which is a "menace to absentee ownership."

Is it any wonder that an alien was impelled to cry out, in the New York Tribune on Thanksgiving Day, about the discrimination against foreign-language papers? "One of our most radical Yiddish newspapers has been translating editorials from 'The Nation,' 'New Republic,' 'Dial,' and others. A reader who inquired of the reason of such a practice has been answered that the authorities would not let such articles appear originally in Yiddish." The alien element, however, need have little fear that its interests are not being cared for. If the hordes of Soviet Russia were to camp in our midst the radical weeklies could be counted on to exclaim, "Here we have the spiritual descendants of our ancestors"—George Washington, for instance. But they should carefully weigh this question: Is not their inverted snobbery helping to establish an evil from which all good Americans are trying to escape—class rule: government, in this instance, by a strongly organized minority of working people?

The Issue of Free Speech

THE New Republic does well to call attention to the dangers which would attend upon the enactment of such a law as that proposed by Attorney-General Palmer for the purpose of curbing radical activities. It does well, also, to point out that no assurance that the law, if enacted, would be construed reasonably by the Department of Justice is sufficient protection against those dangers. A dragnet law, a law so loose or so sweeping in its language that it might be made the instrument of arbitrary suppression of free speech, or might be used to terrorize peaceful citizens in the exercise of other fundamental rights, is a law that ought never to be put on the statute books. A people whose immunity from intimidation is dependent upon the forbearance of executive officers is not a nation of freemen. Any law which, so far from protecting them against the danger of such invasion of their rights, is itself the source of that danger is a bad law. Whatever Mr. Palmer's intent may be, that would be the actual character of the law he proposes. Some of the things the New Republic says about it we most heartily approve:

The first section of the bill makes it unlawful, among other things, to commit "any act of terrorism, hate, revenge, or injury against the person or property" of any United States officer, agent, or employee, "with the intent to . . . cause the change, overthrow, or destruction of the Government, or of any of the laws or authority thereof." The second section not only makes it unlawful to advise, advocate, or teach the commission of any such act, but imposes a penalty of ten years' imprisonment on any one who "makes, displays, writes, prints, or circulates any sign, word, speech, picture, design, argument, or teaching" which justifies such an act. . . . An overzealous champion of the Constitution, goaded to hatred by Attorney-General Palmer's ruthless campaign against free speech, publishes an article attacking the Attorney-General and demanding the repeal of the Espionage law. Clearly the publication is an act of hate against a United States officer, with intent to change a law of the United States. The editor of a newspaper publishes an article suggesting that the vote of the West Virginia electorate and the attack on Mr. Palmer were justified. He may go to jail for ten years. . . . The danger of the Palmer bill does not lie in these extreme examples. They merely illustrate its defective draftsmanship. The real menace to American liberty lies in the less extreme but more probable applications of the bill.

The bill ought not to be passed, and, unless greatly modified, we do not believe that it has the slightest chance of being passed.

But it is not upon the efforts of the New Republic or its kind that the preservation of the right of free speech, or of personal liberty, in this country depends. On the contrary, we are convinced that such danger as there may be of the impairment of those rights is in large measure due to the irrational way in which they are advocated by journals and public speakers of the New Republic type. In the opening words of this very article, for example, the New Republic declares that "Attorney-General Palmer seems bent on wiping out the last vestige of freedom of speech and press in the United States." This is nonsense, and everybody that keeps his eyes open knows that it is nonsense. There have been cases of improper suppression, undoubtedly, just as there have been abuses of every law on the statute books, and abuses of executive power, from that of the President in the White House down to that of the patrolman on his beat; and under the stress of war and after-war conditions there have been more of them than usual, just as there always are. But the right of free speech flourishes in our time to a degree probably never before known in the United States. Not only do scores of Socialist newspapers print, day after day, without molestation, matter that is distinctly aimed at the destruction of our existing form of government and of the institution of property, but the columns of the "capitalist press" are given over, with remarkable liberality, to the dissemination of the utterances of radicals and revolutionaries whenever this forms a natural feature of the day's news. When Rose Pastor Stokes—whose importance from an intellectual standpoint is nil, whose standing arises solely from the accidents of public notoriety—thinks fit to free her mind about the Lusk Committee, her talk is "featured" in the great metropolitan dailies; and this without anything in the headlines or the presentation to break its force. When, at the annual dinner of the New York Academy of Political and Social Science, three speeches are made by men of eminence on the capitalist side of the railroad question, and one on the labor side, it is the labor man's, and the labor man's only—simply because it was the most interesting one—that is given in extenso, and featured in the headlines, in the New York Times. So far from radical opinion being suppressed, it enjoys enormous publicity, without a penny of expense, at the hands of the most conservative newspapers of the country. To talk about "the last vestige of freedom of speech and press," in this situation, is either unscrupulous or childish.

In extenuation of the offense of such misstatements, gross as they are, it may be pleaded that they are after all only an instance of the exaggeration which naturally attends passionate advocacy. But the trouble with the frantic advocates of free speech lies deeper. They constantly exhibit a fundamental want of intelligent understanding of the principle of free speech itself. What gives that principle its high place in the great body of liberal doctrine is the well-grounded conviction that liberty in the expression and dissemination of opinion is essential to the ultimate triumph of truth and to the continuance of human progress. To suppress what the current opinion of to-day regards as error is justly termed bigotry; it arises from considering as absolute truth that which is merely the accepted, and possibly erroneous, belief predominant at a given time, and treating it as sacrosanct. It has been one of the great achievements of the liberal thought of the last two centuries to overcome this bigotry; it is the distinction of latter-day radicals to have developed a new kind of bigotry, a bigotry of free speech—less dangerous no doubt, but not more rational than the bigotry of suppression. Instead of a noble and rational doctrine we have a mere blind dogma, every offense against which is indiscriminately branded as an outrage.

This degeneration of the doctrine of free speech into a mere fetish is most obviously manifested in cases where the so-called suppression of free speech is in reality nothing more than an assertion of the ordinary decencies of life. When a Bouck White is ejected from a church upon whose congregation he insists on inflicting a socialistic harangue, and is punished for the disturbance he had made, it may or may not be that the punishment was justified; but the question has nothing whatever to do with the principle of free speech. The same doctrines which he thought fit to attempt to promote by his preposterous antics are taught every day in scores of publications, and by hundreds of individuals, with absolute impunity. Bouck White is punished for his antics, not for his doctrines. Yet the bigots of free speech wax just as indignant as though some real source of enlightenment or of discussion were being choked up and prevented from spreading its influence in the community. Half the feeling that underlies such wild statements as that of the New Republic about "the last vestige of free speech" arises from seeing in the punishment of a Bouck White, or in the breaking up of some unlicensed red-flag parade by the police, the same kind of invasion of the right of free speech as would be committed by the suppression of a radical newspaper or the imprisonment of an orderly advocate of socialism.

Less obvious, but not less significant, is the confusion of thought that is shown in the field of education. One of the most important outgrowths of the doctrine of free speech is the principle of academic freedom. There have been undoubtedly many deplorable violations of that doctrine in this country; though it should be noted in passing that so far from these violations being more frequent in our time than in the past, they are far less frequent and far less extreme. Such an event as the dismissal of Professor Ross from Leland Stanford University on account of his opinions in regard to railroad corruption in California would be almost impossible to-day; still more out of the question would be what happened to President Andrews of Brown University, at the time of the free-silver campaign, on account of his views on bimetallism. These cases and a few others have helped to educate the country toward an understanding of the principle of professorial independence, which a generation ago had hardly obtained even a footing in American public opinion. But while the principle of academic freedom is a legitimate outgrowth of the general doctrine of free speech, the notion that the same maxims are applicable to the case of teachers of children in the public schools is a morbid excrescence of it, the result not of thought but of want of thought.

That a competent professor, whose relations are with students well advanced toward manhood and possessing some maturity of thought, should feel that no restraint is placed upon him in the exercise and expression of his independent judgment, both in the class-room and elsewhere, is essential to the maintenance of a high level of thought, and to the full development of the intellectual and moral possibilities of the nation. No such consideration applies to the case of teachers whose function it is simply to provide the children under their charge with the standard elements of an ordinary education. Those children, when the time comes, will have every reasonable opportunity of weighing such arguments as there may be in favor of the destruction of our form of government, the abolition of property, or, for that matter, the extinction of our accepted code of morals. To insist that their childish minds should not be deprived of the opportunity of determining for themselves whether the existing order of society is good or bad, that they shall be brought up with no prepossession in favor of the government, the laws, or the ethics upon which the community which maintains the schools is founded, is a notion so absurd that to discuss it ought to be regarded as a waste of time. Yet it is only upon the acceptance of this notion that the indignation which our radicals are so ready to vent at any failure to extend the doctrine of academic freedom to the kindergarten can be grounded.

We do not deny that in a time like this there is great danger of violation of the true principle of free speech. There is even danger that we may fall into the habit not only of violating it in particular cases, but of forgetting its cardinal importance in the abstract. With mischievous doctrines in the air, and with real peril to the community not only in sight but often actually realized, the temptation to resort to a short-cut to get rid of the evil is to many minds irresistible. And the short-cut of suppression will not only fail to remove the evil, but will certainly increase it. Bad teachings cannot be overcome by force; on the contrary, to persecute the disseminators of them for opinion's sake is to give them a hold far beyond that which in themselves they are capable of commanding. In large part, they will run their course by virtue of the native intelligence and the sound instincts of the people themselves. Everything, too, must be done that can be done to counteract them by argument and persuasion; but in the face of all temptation we must hold fast the great principle of freedom of opinion. But that principle is not in the keeping of those who in its name demand either absurdities or impossibilities. The plain man's common sense revolts at the requirement that he shall tolerate what is offensive to the instinct of decency or of propriety. Preposterous claims urged in the name of any principle do not elevate the principle but degrade it. The doctrine of free speech is a liberal principle; not the least of the dangers to which it is exposed lies in the discredit brought upon it by those who seek to convert it into a fanatical dogma.

Justice Holmes's Dissent

THE dissenting opinion written by Justice Holmes in the case arising under the War Espionage act, recently decided by the Supreme Court, has been widely hailed as a reassertion of the right of free speech. Coming from such a source, it is of the first importance that its exact character be clearly understood.

Three distinct elements go to the making up of this interesting paper. There is the plea for the principle of free speech as such, without special reference to the particular case in hand. There is the plea that the insignificance of the defendants, and the improbability of their actions resulting in any great injury to the Republic, should have protected them against the infliction either of any punishment at all, or at all events of any heavy punishment. Finally, there is the plea that the defendants did not in fact commit the crime contemplated by the law under which they were convicted. We shall take up these three elements in the reverse order of that in which we have stated them.

Upon the last point we see no escape from the conclusion that Justice Holmes is clearly and palpably wrong, for the question turns upon the plain meaning of ordinary words. There were four counts in the indictment. The decision of the Supreme Court sustaining the conviction of the defendants rests solely on the third and fourth counts. These counts deal not with the mere utterance of sentiments or opinions, however disloyal or abusive, but with actual incitement to disloyal acts. The question is whether in the pamphlets issued by the defendants there was or was not, as the law requires in order to make their conduct criminal, an intent "to cripple or hinder the United States in the prosecution of the war." The majority opinion says:

The plain purpose of their propaganda was to excite, at the supreme crisis of the war, disaffection, sedition, riots, and, as they hoped, revolution, in this country for the purpose of embarrassing and if possible defeating the military plans of the Government in Europe.

The dissenting opinion says:

I do not see how any one can find the intent required by the statute in any of the defendant's words. . . . To say that two phrases taken literally might import a suggestion of conduct that would have interference with the war as an indirect and probably undesired effect seems to me by no means enough to show an attempt to produce that effect.

About a dozen passages from the pamphlets are quoted in the majority opinion. It will be sufficient here to cite two. The first is one which Judge Holmes admits does "urge curtailment of production of things necessary to the prosecution of the war within the meaning of the act of May 16, 1917"; but he denies that this was done "with intent by such curtailment to cripple or hinder the United States in the prosecution of the war." It is as follows:

Workers in the ammunition factories, You are producing bullets, bayonets, cannon, to murder not only the Germans, but also your dearest, best, who are in Russia and are fighting for freedom.

To the second of the passages we have in mind Judge Holmes makes no express reference. It is an incitement not to the mere curtailment of production, but to insurrectionary violence. Addressed to "Socialists, Anarchists, Industrial Workers of the World, Socialist Labor party men, and other revolutionary organizations" and calling upon them to "unite for action," it proceeds as follows:

Know, you lovers of freedom, that in order to save the Russian revolution we must keep the armies of the Allied countries busy at home.

As it is impossible to impute to Judge Holmes any intention to deal otherwise than sincerely with the facts before him, one has to take refuge in the hypothesis that when he speaks of "an indirect and probably undesired effect," he is confusing the question of motive with the question of intent. Interference with the war was palpably the direct and the desired effect which these appeals were intended to produce, though it is entirely possible that the original desire and primary motive behind them was something quite different. To prove motive in a case of crime may be necessary as part of the evidence that the crime had been committed; but in order to prove unlawful intent it is not in the least necessary to prove a wicked motive. Eugene Aram was none the less guilty of murder because he was animated not by greed for riches but by the desire to use the old miser's wealth for the good of his fellow men. But, whatever the explanation of Judge Holmes's position, the falsity of it is evident.

On the second point, that of the partial or complete immunity which the insignificance of the defendants, or their inability to do great harm, should have given them, the case is not quite so simple. A question of expediency is here involved, upon which no absolute rule can be laid down. It might have been wise, it might have been politic, it might have been humane, for the lower court to let these men off with a trifling punishment. On the other hand, it is equally possible that the wisest, the most politic, and even the most humane course in such a matter, is by severe punishment to serve notice on all prospective offenders that they cannot hope to escape terrible consequences if they deliberately defy a law enacted by the nation for its protection from internal enemies in time of war. But though much might be said on both sides of this question as affecting the decision of the court of first instance—and still more as affecting the exercise of executive clemency—considerations of this kind have no place in determining whether the decision shall be overruled by a court of appeal. The court below inflicted no penalty that was not provided in the law under which it acted. As an obiter dictum it would have been quite proper for Judge Holmes to declare his opinion of the unwisdom of the sentence imposed. But if the Supreme Court were to make this opinion a ground for reversing the judgment of the court below it would erect into a principle of law that which ought obviously to be left a matter of judicial and executive discretion. We can think of no precedent more harmful, more calculated to rob the law of the vigor essential to its efficacy, than such a decision would establish.

We come now to the last of the three elements which enter into Judge Holmes's opinion. He has given impressive and, in the main, sound expression to the general principle of free speech. It is of the first importance for us all to remember—for we are many of us prone to forget—that "we should be eternally vigilant against attempts to check the expression of opinions that we loathe and believe to be fraught with death." It is well that we should be reminded from a high source that "the best test of truth is the power of the thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the market." The unfortunate thing about it all is that these maxims, so essential to the vitality of liberal institutions, should be cited to justify that which in no rational view of the matter falls within their scope. What these men were punished for is not the expression of opinions. Their harangues to their revolutionary brethren had absolutely nothing to do with any competition in the market of thought. The opinions they expressed were at that same moment being expressed—expressed openly, with millions for an audience, not circulated merely among those who were already revolutionists or anarchists—without let or hindrance. It is as incitement to action, not as expressions of opinion, that their pamphlets are declared by the Supreme Court to have brought them under the operation of the criminal law.

Justice Holmes is a sincere and high-minded advocate of the principles of liberty. But a greater than he has had something to say on the subject. Never have those principles been stated in a form more uncompromising than in John Stuart Mill's great work. No one will accuse him of making any concession in the matter of free speech except such as is the plain demand of sanity and common sense. In the essay "On Liberty" there occurs this passage:

No one pretends that actions should be as free as opinions. On the contrary, even opinions lose their immunity when the circumstances in which they are expressed are such as to constitute their expression a positive instigation to some mischievous act. An opinion that corn-dealers are starvers of the poor, or that private property is robbery, ought to be unmolested when simply circulated through the press, but may justly incur punishment when delivered orally to an excited mob assembled before the house of a corn-dealer, or when handed about among the same mob in the form of a placard.

It should be particularly noted that what Mill here points out is that the mere expression of opinion, without any overt incitement to action, "may justly incur punishment" when the circumstances make that expression equivalent to such incitement. That punishment may justly be inflicted for plain incitement, such as is contained in the seditious pamphlets passed upon by the Supreme Court, was evidently to Mill's mind too obvious to need statement. But our dilettante radicals know better. The New Republic brands the Supreme Court as sanctioning by its decision a "barbarous persecution of opinion." Yet neither the decision nor anything in the opinion accompanying it militates in the slightest degree against freedom of opinion; it does not conflict in the least with the broad principles of free speech asserted by Judge Holmes; it is in perfect accord with the view stated by the foremost of modern champions of the doctrine of liberty. But all this makes no difference. Somebody has said something or printed something, and has been put in prison for it—that is enough and to spare. What, are we to see a man suffer for "free speech" and not cry out upon the persecutors?

Portrait of an American

BLOOD makes the American no more than the gentleman. The man to whom, desperate of definition, we have lately taken to pointing, saying, "There, at any rate, is an example of what we mean by Americanism," was never tired of analyzing the blood of his veins into a dozen national elements. The American is he who has America in his heart.

The children of the first comers, those who are not conscious of roots reaching even obscurely into other deep-soiled civilizations, are Americans only potentially. Every man's experience will furnish him with an instance of a Russian or some other who has come to us with America in his heart, whose feeling for America puts to blush those who have worn the name longer with less right. In such a man or woman America sees herself more clearly than in those whose fascinated contemplation of other civilizations leads them to give back America chiefly as the reflection of her crude aspiration to culture or her stupid insensitiveness to it, her want of thrift and neatness, her slums and shanties, her negroes and her "foreigners" and her vulgar rich. To find the American it is idle to search the heart of such.

A specific instance is best, and a true one. If you would find the American, let a New Haven train carry you out of the city to one of the first villages in which there is some flavor of New England. You will find him just across the street from the station, and he is—an Irishman. At least his father was, coming here shortly after the first wave of immigration, say the middle of the last century. This father of Joe's went to work on the railroad for seventy-five cents a day. Raised a family on it, too, of which Joe in due course came to be part. For him there was the public school and at odd times a little reading of the law, just enough to enable him to perceive the kinship between it and his own large common-sense. Meanwhile the village grows. Estates line the shore, farm houses are converted into comfortable modern residences, the village people continue to prosper by virtue of a sort of ancestral momentum, and around Joe's office—"Real Estate and Notary Public"—there tumbles and laughs and chatters and brawls an Italian colony.

Nobody ever told Joe about Americanization. He was neither the victim nor the initiator of propaganda. But his steady eye fell on these turbulent Latins who had come to fill his Irish father's place on the railroad. How far did he consciously phrase to himself the paternal struggle? Why should he be the one to say to himself, "These people do not understand"? What was there to make him perceive that it was not enough to come to America, that it was necessary also to be American? Why was his the hand that went out to the men in greeting and in help?

Behold him clad in the gay stole and plumed hat of a ranking officer in Lodge Vittorio Emmanuele III! Not a word of their "soft bastard Latin" can he speak, nor ever will. He is not prying fascinated into their exotic life. "They seem to like to get me into this sort of thing. They are good boys." Votes, says some one, mindful of many things. But not at all; Joe holds these many years no office but that of a Justice of the Peace. But if there is land to be bought—and they thrive, these Italians—Joe does not, like the law, coldly leave the purchaser to look out for himself. If there is feud in the quarter, family or other, Joe compounds it. Was it a soldier absent without leave? Joe searched him out and sent him back wiser and less sad. Themis dwells in the quarter, affably companionship with the poor—Astraea redux. Or, as a less classical posterity puts it when pressed for explanation of their devotion, "Joe, he fair."

Here, then, or nowhere is America—not a matter of time or place, but very clearly a state of the soul. And that quality of heart which most disposes it to be the dwelling place of America is precisely that which the Americans whom Joe is making out of his Italians instinctively recognize in him—fairness. It can be put with a hard brilliance as "a career open to talent." It can be put cynically as "each for himself and devil take the hindmost." It can be figured ridiculously as a blindfold justice with scrupulous scale and unrelenting sword, which it most emphatically is not. This fairness of the right American sort is not incompatible with a certain shrewdness, but it is impossible without a certain kindness, like Joe's. It cannot exist apart from the doing of things—big things, even—but the American is willing—not eager, mark you—to do some things, and big things, too, that are of no immediate personal profit to himself; that's Joe, too. It cherishes a well-nigh impossible desire to extend excellence without degrading it; but it does not aim to reform the world. If such an impression has got abroad, then America is unfortunate in her spokesmen and their hearers. Joe, if he could speak and be heard, would render a different account.

Behold him in the Columbus Day procession, led by the band—earnest individualists—with dubious regimentation everywhere wavering to a rag-tag of urchins in the rear. And Joe, poised uncertainly on a lurching float, clad in the motley of Uncle Sam. Bravo! Nobly borne! "Cristoforo Colombo we should have made him, too, but there is only one Joe! He shall play it next year!" Evviva! Good work! Cristoforo Colombo!

Leonid Andreyev and the Bolsheviki

HERE is no longer any doubt as to the fact of Leonid Andreyev's death. Newspapers arriving from the other side have confirmed the previous report of his sudden death in Finland. He passed away almost on the eve of a visit to the United States, all the plans for which had already been made. He wanted to come to the New World in order to tell its people what he had already told them so tragically in his powerful appeal for aid to perishing Russia. But fate ruled otherwise, and instead of the commanding figure of a great writer, only the report of his sudden end has reached America.

Nowadays, whenever a Russian name is mentioned, the question immediately arises, "Where does he stand on the matter of Bolshevism?" In the case of Andreyev the reply is clear-cut, for his attitude followed inevitably from his political credo. Andreyev was a true Russian patriot, first of all. This means that to him his Russia was the greatest and the dearest thing there was. There was no publicist or writer in Russia more ardently desirous of a victory over Germany than he, for a defeat at her hands meant the enslavement of Russia and possibly even destruction. There scarcely was a more bitter opponent of Bolshevism in Russia than he, for to him the Bolshevik experiments, whether successful or not, would inevitably entail the country's passing through international treason, anarchy, and eventually becoming a prey to Germany. The Bolsheviki even attempted to buy him. Shortly before his death, an emissary from Gorky visited Andreyev bidding him to help on the Bolsheviki's "literary" work, in which case two million rubles would be placed at his disposal for publishing anything he wanted. Andreyev was starving. But he spurned this offer, refusing to treat with Gorky's emissary. Leonid Andreyev was not for sale.

Since the beginning of the Russian revolution Andreyev was invariably on the side of those who strove to establish in Russia a free democratic order to open the way for the country's development along the lines which were most imperative for her. He consistently opposed, with all the might of his powerful pen, all disintegrating elements. Among the many articles and appeals which he wrote during those first months of the Russian revolution, two stand out particularly. One is entitled, "To Thee, O Soldier!" It is an appeal to the army after the first defeats caused by propaganda. The second is called, "Ruin and Destruction." It is an analysis of the misfortunes which were soon to grow out of the Bolshevik régime.

Andreyev began his appeal to the soldier of Russia with a recital of what the army meant in the people's eyes under the imperial régime:

Under Nicholas the autocrat you were a slave. And your people dreaded you. To whom did your gray uniform bring joy? To whom did your gun and your sharp bayonet bring peace? Only to the enemies of the people, the hangmen of the people. Whenever rows of gray uniforms would appear in the streets, we all knew what that meant; death was stalking behind! Death was moving upon the innocent, the starving, upon those who longed for a bright life, who dared to raise their voices of protest against the tyrant. Death was stalking, and in its wake, destruction, ruin, tears, and horror. Soldier, you were terrible then!

Then came the revolution, and the soldiers were no longer the enemies of the people.

Do you remember, O soldier, how the heart of the whole people quivered when the first blow of the Cossack sabre descended not on the head of a brother or a friend, but on that of a police henchman? How we loved you then, our soldier! And when . . . red flags swept and fluttered over the sharp points of the bayonets, and when, as blood to the heart, they all flowed towards the Taurida Palace, and when the music of freedom thundered forth, mingling its triumphant strains with the last dying whistling of the bullets, do you remember, O soldier, what you saw in the streets? Do you remember that black crowd of citizens, half-frenzied with suffering and sleepless nights? Do you remember how those eyes gazed with faith and love at you, at your gray uniform, at your bayonet?

But it was only during the first short months following the revolution that the soldier meant all that. With the first test of morale, in the summer of 1917, there was a bitter revelation. At the rear the soldiers, drunken with power and recklessness, were carousing in the streets of the cities, terrorizing the peaceful population. And at the front?

Oh, how you fled from the field of battle, Russian soldier! The world has never known or seen such flight, or such hordes of traitors. The world knew a single Judas. And here tens of thousands of Judases are rushing along, throwing away their rifles, and boasting of meetings. Whither do they hasten? They hasten to betray their native land, to deliver her to the amazed foe.

Andreyev ends his powerful picture of the betrayal of Russia by her soldiers who suddenly lost all sense of patriotism and opened the frontiers of the country to the inveterate enemy, with a stirring appeal to the soldiers to awake from their nightmare.

But this stirring appeal came too late. Elemental forces had already carried unfortunate Russia into the whirlpool. The army was not the only thing that had been affected by the poison of disintegration and the propaganda that finally destroyed Russia. Late in the summer of 1917, Andreyev gave graphic expression to the condition into which Russia had fallen in an article which he called "Ruin and Destruction."

"Our country is in mortal danger," are the opening words of this article. Declaring that the time has come for speaking out clearly, when it is the duty of every citizen to understand what lies in store for his native land, the author draws a pen picture of the misfortunes which he sees coming upon Russia with the implacability of fate. First, starvation. "It comes on irresistibly." The peasantry has lost faith in the efficacy of the revolutionary order and refuses to cooperate with the city. It starves the city. Second, the disintegration of the army. The propaganda of fraternization, spread by the Germans and the Bolsheviki, makes it possible for the enemy to transfer his troops to the front in France. Third, the possibility of separate peace and the consequent treason to Russia's Allies. Then, coming on behind, financial bankruptcy, and even the break-up of Russia herself. Finland and Ukraina are already talking separation.

Who is next? Who else hates Russia so much that he would not remain with her a single moment? Who else demands to be divorced from dying Russia? Go and strike her. Tear her to pieces. Steal whatever you can. Why should you pity her, when she does not pity herself? Why should you preserve her and try to save her when she herself does not want to save herself, when she walks straight into the grave and sings her own funeral march in a thousand voices?

The whole country is lost in a chaos of party disputes and wranglings. There is no unity of action or of purpose. What can save Russia under such circumstances?

I do not condemn anybody, for everybody is to blame. Who can be punished when all are at fault?

The storm is coming on. Things are becoming darker and darker. His eloquent appeal to the soldiers ends with a note of hope. "Ruin and Destruction" ends with a note of utter hopelessness:

And perhaps—perhaps there really ought not be any Russia? Perhaps this is merely an old-fashioned term it is time to destroy: If there is to be no "Russia," there will be something else; and "at the coffin's portal young life shall play anew." Does it matter, after all, whether it is Russian life, or young German life? The people, too, will not perish. You cannot destroy at one blow one hundred million people. They will get used to the new conditions. Who knows, perhaps there really ought not to be any Russia?

The red terror of the Bolshevik régime drove Andreyev into Finland, and there he remained until his death. Living in poverty, in eternal torment over the fate of his native land, Andreyev could write little—only an unfinished novel, which is still unpublished. The proposal of the Prinkipo Conference, however, evoked from the exile his swan song, "S. O. S."

The attitude of the Allied Governments toward Russia is either madness or treason.

This is the question which Andreyev sets before himself for solution in the first part of his article. Proving conclusively that it cannot be madness, he leaves the question there and refrains from drawing the other conclusion. The second part of the article addresses to all civilized nations of the world an appeal for aid to Russia.

Andreyev compares himself to the telegraphist on a sinking ship who casts into the darkness and the storm his frantic appeal for help. The anguished cry of "S.O.S." has now gone through the world. Has it struck the hearts of men? Has it impelled the bows of the world's ships of state to turn towards Russia?

In his unpublished novel Andreyev represents Satan as coming to the earth to teach men how to lie. But he finds falsehood so highly developed among men that his own lies seem childish and pale. In the chaos of falsehood and dishonesty that inundated the world around him, Andreyev was appealing to the redeeming qualities of men. Death engulfed him while the tides of chaos were still rolling in. But as these tides subside, appeals such as his will sound stronger and more triumphant and will be the guiding music to lead men's wearied feet to a better world that must emerge out of the trials of our fearful days.

A Lesson in International Leagues

IN all the discussions around and about the League of Nations, and the search for precedents that might promise success or otherwise to the great experiment, we seem to have lost sight of the fact that for ten years past the United States and Canada have been giving a practical demonstration of the possibilities of such an international arrangement. In the International Joint Commission these two neighboring countries have what is in effect a League of Nations limited to their common interests. Admitting differences in degree and complexity, the principles involved in both the North American League and the League of Nations are sufficiently alike to make the very real success of the former a subject for serious thought.

The International Joint Commission grew out of the Treaty of January 11, 1909, between the United States and Great Britain. The preamble of that treaty sets forth as its objects "to prevent disputes regarding the use of boundary waters and to settle all questions which are now pending between the United States and the Dominion of Canada involving the rights, obligations, or interests of either in relation to the other or to the inhabitants of the other, along their common frontier, and to make provision for the adjustment and settlement of all such questions as may hereafter arise." Jurisdiction to settle such questions was vested in a Commission, consisting of three citizens of the United States appointed by the President and three Canadian subjects of His Majesty appointed by the King on the recommendation of the Canadian Government.

The treaty is too intricate to go into fully, but certain points are worth emphasizing. The first article provides that "the navigation of all navigable boundary waters shall forever continue free and open for the purposes of commerce to the inhabitants and to the ships, vessels, and boats of both countries equally." The same right of navigation is extended to Lake Michigan and to all canals connecting boundary waters. By article 2 each country reserves its national jurisdiction and control over the use and diversion of waters flowing across the boundary or into boundary waters, but "any interference with or diversion from their natural channel of such waters on either side of the boundary shall give rise to the same rights and entitle the injured parties to the same legal remedies as if such injury took place in the country where such diversion or interference occurs." Canadians under this article have the right to go into the United States courts and seek redress for injury sustained in Canada, and Americans have similar rights in Canadian courts. The third and fourth articles confer direct jurisdiction on the Commission, and create what is in effect an international court of appeal for the settlement of questions involving the use of boundary waters.

Article 9, on the other hand, makes the Commission an investigating body, to enquire into and report upon any question involving rights, obligations, or interests "along the common frontier." The Treaty provides that all such questions "shall be referred" to the Commission on the request of either one or other of the two Governments.

The tenth article goes much farther. It provides that "any questions or matters of differences arising between the High Contracting Parties" involving the rights, obligations, or interests of the United States or Canada in relation to each other or their respective inhabitants, may be referred for decision to the Commission. There is no limitation here, either in respect to the character of the question referred or to the place of its origin. It is not confined to the common frontier, nor is it confined to any particular class of questions. Both parties must consent to the reference to the Commission. In the case of the United States it must also be with the advice and consent of the Senate, and in the case of Great Britain with the consent of the Governor-General-in-Council of Canada, that is to say, the Canadian Government. Under this article the Commission becomes a miniature Hague Tribunal for the final settlement of questions of any character arising between the United States and Canada.

This Commission has been in existence for ten years, carrying on its very important work so smoothly and unostentatiously that probably most of the inhabitants of the two countries have never even heard of it. During that time it has disposed of a number of questions involving the use of boundary waters, principally questions of power development and questions affecting navigation interests, ranging from the St. Croix River in the east, forming the boundary between Maine and New Brunswick, to the Lake of the Woods in the west. It is at present dealing with a large irrigation problem in the Far West affecting the people of Montana, Alberta, and Saskatchewan. It has investigated and reported upon several big questions along the frontier, such as the pollution of boundary waters; and the two Governments are now referring to it the very important problem of developing the St. Lawrence as an international waterway from the lakes to the sea. Up to the present time no questions have been referred under article 10.

The positive usefulness of this Commission has been repeatedly proved during the past ten years, but, as the writer has said elsewhere, "the true measure of its usefulness to the people of the United States and Canada lies not even so much in its positive as in its negative qualities, not so much in the cases it has actually settled as in the infinitely larger number of cases that never come before it for consideration, simply because the Commission is there, as a sort of international safety-valve, and therefore the sting is taken out of the situation." There are many pessimists who are convinced that the League of Nations can never be of any real service to the world. There were many ten years ago who predicted that the International Joint Commission would do more harm than good to the United States and Canada. The latter have been proved false prophets. Possibly the former may share the same fate.

Lavengro

Weary of Shaw and, O ye gods, how weary

Of rediscovering deities with Wells!
Unmoved by Conan Doyle's séances eerie,
And bored with young romance and wedding bells,

I turn—ah, Brother of the glade and highway,

How good it is to breathe thy braver air!

To make thy loitering, devious pathway my way,

To have but eighteen pence—and not to care!

Find in a mug of ale seraphic glories
But be content with water from a spring;

And while inspired postillions tell their stories

Forget that time—and plots—are on the wing;

To share thy crusty speech and hearty laughter,

To dabble with Armenian, Hebrew, Greek;

Translate Ab Gwilym 'neath a fitch-hung rafter

And glean wild Irish in the peat-fire's reek;

To sit down with thy dusky folk and hearken

To age-old songs of Romany, rome and dree;

Drift sleepward when the shadows stretch and darken

And wander footloose when the shadows flee!

Forever mayst thou weave thy magic olden,

Thy gypsy glamerie shot through with gleams

Of pulsing life and moments sunlit, golden—

The Backwardness of Italian Farming

ON the kaleidoscopic play of current events in Italy, and its relation to her future progress, one can not write with any feeling of confidence. The only certainty is that the boat is rocking too violently just now for speed towards any predetermined harbor of safety. Her prospects are deeply affected, however, by certain conditions not due to the war, and not subject to the jurisdiction of the Paris Conference. They are defects which must be dealt with at home, and in respect of which the outsider may only record observations and offer friendly suggestion. And yet in the successful solution of these problems outsiders have a deep interest, material as well as sentimental. Modern life has knit the civilized nations of the world into a whole which is sure to suffer when any single member is seriously ailing, and a derelict Italy would constitute a drag on American material prosperity as well as a sense of pain to the countless Americans who love it for its many memories of an intensely interesting past, and its varied charms of to-day.

It was my privilege, during the spring and early summer of the present year, to travel through large portions of Sicily and the Italian peninsula, not following the routes by which the tourist ordinarily hurries from point to point of historic or artistic interest, traveling always in daylight, and keeping my eyes open to conditions of life as well as to natural scenery. A farmer's son by birth and always interested in agricultural conditions, it was the life of the farmer folk of Italy that impressed itself most on my attention. And that impression was in the main a profound sense of depression.

There are certain features of Italian life which almost always present themselves to American travelers—did so present themselves to me on an earlier visit—as simply a part of the delightfully interesting novelties of Mediterranean travel. The man and wife with their donkey cart on one of the great public piazzas of Palermo, three cows tied to the rear of the cart and calves tied to the tails of the cows, waiting languidly through the forenoon for customers to come and buy their pitcherful of milk; the barefooted, sunburned old woman, hobbling down some rocky steep with an immense bag of forage on her head for her cow; the weazened farmer plodding homeward in the evening towards the high-perched town, only the head and tail of his little donkey visible from between the great bundles of mingled oats and clover, cut with the sickle of his remote ancestors, and tied carefully together and strapped over the donkey's back; the yoke of big-bodied, long-horned, slow-moving oxen, drawing through the young corn a plow corresponding more nearly to that described in Virgil's Georgics than to any cultivator used by the wide-awake corn grower of to-day—all this is certainly very interesting to the traveler, and furnishes excellent snapshots for his kodak. And if these were sufficiently isolated cases we might be contented to let it rest at that. Many of them can be paralleled more or less closely in remote parts of our own land. The trouble is, however, that they are not isolated, but represent so large a portion of the present agricultural life of Italy as to constitute a very heavy drag on her material prosperity. Italy has a very dense population, a large proportion of land either completely or relatively non-productive, and a heavy handicap in manufacturing in her lack of fuel and raw materials. A large part of her population can live on a very low plane of existence from the produce of their little mountain farms and herds. But it is a plane of existence too low to bring personal contentment, or social and political stability. In Sicily and South Italy it has led to extensive emigration of the more capable and ambitious, the very men and women who are most sorely needed at home. In northern Italy manufacturing industries retain a larger portion of this element, but the problems of successful manufacturing are becoming ever more difficult as the cost of imported fuel and raw materials steadily grows. It is evident, then, that the situation calls for a supply of home-grown food as cheap and abundant as is possible. The use on a large scale of electrical energy generated by water power—white coal, carbone bianco, as the Italians call it—will do something to ease the fuel situation. And the water which generates this power can in many localities be still further used for the irrigation of tillable lands on lower levels.

But all this will not reach the root of the trouble. The methods of tillage itself, the tools employed, the mental attitude of the tiller towards his work, must be very materially altered if Italy is to keep pace with other nations in modern paths of progress. One may ride hundreds of miles in Italy, through the very finest of farm lands as well as the most forbidding, and see no hoe that is not far heavier than is needed for its work, and few in which the handle is not so badly fitted as to add materially to the energy required to wield it. This worse than useless extra weight the tiller must lift some thousands of times in a day's labor.

Many of the most profitable triumphs of modern "efficiency" in great manufacturing industries have consisted in detecting and eliminating just such elements of wasted energy, whether human or mechanical. What I have said of the Italian hoe will apply with equal or greater force to the scythe with which most of the hay in Italy is cut, a tool heavier and clumsier than the bush scythe, or "brush hook," used to clear the locust sprouts and blackberry briars from the cow pastures of the West Virginia mountainsides. I do not, of course, assert that there is absolutely no modern agricultural machinery, or tools, in Italy. I saw two self-binders, a few years ago, in the broad wheat fields near Syracuse, but both very inefficiently drawn by two or three yoke each of those slow and awkwardly moving Sicilian oxen. They are picturesque animals, I admit, and possibly a justifiable instrument for the work which you see them doing about the docks at Messina. But the farmers of America have long ago learned that such an "unhastie beaste," as Edmund Spenser would have put it, will not do for modern farming. To talk of supplanting the Italian ox teams may seem to some little less than Bolshevistic radicalism; but when one passes through the rich cornfields between Milan and Turin, with their loose and easily tilled soil, and sees farmer after farmer plowing the corn one row at a time with two of those immense oxen drawing the plow, and often an extra man or woman at their head, one realizes, or certainly should realize, what a disastrous waste it all involves. In a long journey through that region, I saw just one fairly sensible outfit for plowing corn: a plow not more than one generation back in pattern, drawn by a light-weight, briskly-stepping horse, with a bright young woman at the handles. She was plowing more corn than two of those lumbering ox-team outfits, and if I had seen a dozen like her in all Italy, where I saw hundreds of the other, I should feel more hopeful for the immediate future of the Italian farmer.

There is a very serious retarding influence also in the absence of even a fair beginning of an adequate system of country roads. To thousands of Italian wheat fields even a two-wheeled cart, to say nothing of a really efficient two-horse wagon, can not make its way. Consequently you see the sheaves of wheat tied together and slung over the donkey's back to be carried to the stacking place or to the threshing floor. And then the wheat itself must be conveyed in little bits by the same slow method to the granary. And when it is sold, a very large amount of it goes the usually long distance to the nearest railway by the same conveyance. Almost the whole of it, too, was harvested not with the modern reaper, even when grown on great level plains, nor with the "cradle" of a generation ago, but with the sickle that the founders of the Roman Republic received from their forefathers. I said to a business man in Palermo without contradiction, "America can take its wheat as it stands in the fields of the great Northwest, harvest it, send it to seaboard by rail, and finally lay it down on the decks here in Palermo, at a less cost per bushel, when estimated in units of human labor, than it takes to place in your Palermo markets a very large share of the wheat grown right here in Sicily."

But, I am told, labor is very cheap, and the cost in money is not so great after all. Yes, labor is cheap in Italy, or was until the abnormal conditions of the war supervened, and cheap chiefly for the reason that this retention of ineffective tools and methods makes it relatively so unproductive. And because of this, the most promising young men of large portions of Italy have hardly any other ambition than to save up money enough, by rigorous self-denial, to purchase passage to North or South America. I am aware, of course, that able Italian scientists are giving their attention to agricultural problems, under Government patronage, and I know something of what public-spirited individuals are doing. I have seen in Italy countless farms and gardens and orchards so cleanly kept and so abundant in yield that I should be glad to have them shown as models almost anywhere in the United States. But all this does not alter the fact, or remove the economic and social implications of the fact, that even in most of these very cases the same amount of physical energy, with suitable tools and methods, would have brought a greatly increased return. I know, of course, that there is a shameful amount of wasted effort in our own land, too; but Italy is about the last great country in the world to be able to endure safely a conspicuous amount of wasted effort in this particular line. If she had a Cavour to resort to for guidance to-day, I am convinced that he would look, for the salvation of his country, not to Dalmatia, or Africa, or outside expansion in any other direction. He would turn his attention rather to the development of Italy's magnificent potentialities in water power, so as to remove the costly dependence of her manufacturing industries upon imported fuel. He would begin at once a thoroughgoing system of farm roads, bringing the whole of Italy's tillable land into connection with markets, and at the same time furnishing better avenues for the penetration of modern enlightenment into all parts of the realm. And especially would he be interested—as the Cavour of actual history was interested, until other pressing problems took the lead—in the modernization of Italian agriculture. In these lines, with the application of scientific knowledge already in existence, backed by orderly government and wisely directed state assistance, financed by American capital where, and only where, home capital should not prove sufficient, lies ample and remunerative employment for all the brawn and brains that Italy can furnish. Here lies her best hope of liquidating her crushing indebtedness; and schemes of external expansion, drawing her best blood away, can only retard that hope and increase the chances of disaster.

What I have said in these paragraphs springs from no lack of sympathy for Italy, no spirit of censoriousness. Affection for her began with my college days and has increased with every year that has passed. And my inability to believe in her "rivendicazioni" following the war, whether embodied in the formulæ of Orlando and his successor, or in the wild dreams and escapades of D'Annunzio, rests upon the firm conviction that they too, in the long run, point, not to happiness, prosperity and power, but to weakness, adversity, and regret.

Syllogisms and Presidents

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

In the good old days, in those much-abused private schools, we learned something about logic. We learned about the syllogism, for example—that neat little logical formula in which the conclusion comes out all right if you get your premises straight. Your premises must fit perfectly into each other; if one of them is turned round the wrong way, all is lost. An approved example was: "All men are mortal; Socrates was a man; therefore Socrates was mortal." But if your minor premise had been stated in this way: "All men are mortal; Socrates was mortal; therefore he was a man," you were all at sea; for Socrates might have been a horse or any other animal, and he would still have been mortal. Plainly a syllogism does not always hold logic.

which they have used since 1916. At that time, indeed, they put it up on posters in public places. They thought it was an argument. In syllogistic form it would have run like this: "All great men are criticized; President Wilson is criticized; therefore he is a great man." This sounds very well, and could bear being turned round almost any way. Unfortunately, however, there is one adjective too many qualifying the major premise. To be strictly true it should have read: "All men are criticized; Lincoln and Wilson were men; therefore they were criticized." This may be true, but it proves nothing further. You and I are criticized; so are Tom, Dick, and Harry; hence greatness is really beside the question.

To many minds, however, the fact that Lincoln was criticized is a perfectly good argument for Mr. Wilson's greatness; though you and I and poor old T., D., and H. have an equal right to avail ourselves of it. Such are the difficulties of logic. The case, in fact, is an admirable specimen of the efficacy of a single lone argument for any cause. If they had any more they might get still further tangled up.

When you come to think of it, however, there is another argument. It is simply that all opposition to the Administration is a play of party politics. This is a time-worn argument, but it is still good. You can take it out, like a last year's coat, and shake it, and wear it in spite of the odor of tar-camphor. But, as a matter of fact, it must be taken seriously; for in these days it amounts to a bitter accusation.

No earnest, honest man, it would seem—not even if he be deluded—is playing mere party politics to-day; unless it turns out that a question of party politics automatically resolves itself into a question of patriotism. If the question is one of nationalism against internationalism, as the terms are popularly understood, you go at once beyond party lines. Dark forces threaten on every side; and vistas of sinister possibilities open up before us. The question at issue is: What is best for America? As to that, you may differ; but the man, whoever and wherever he may be, who is thinking below the level of that question, can have no real part in its just settlement.

We may say, as the Villager said a while ago, that we are beginning to realize that we cannot have a League of Nations and at the same time have nations. Or we may believe that any kind of League of Nations is better than none; or that a properly guarded and qualified League of Nations is best of all; but in none of these assumptions are we merely following party lines. The winds of Despair have blown us out beyond them; and the few who may still be huddled together behind party fences will be shut out of the real contest. Just one thing is left to think of, as regards party; which fence has an open gate into the broad fields of progress, justice, and wise provision for the future—which means genuine idealism? Idealism, to be sure, is a much-abused word. It may mean blinding fog or clear vision. The great men, in the present crisis as in every other, are those who will see beyond their own wills and their own fancied interests.

Rumania in Bessarabia

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

In spite of Russia's enormous sacrifices in the war, sacrifices which, in the judgment of military experts, exercised a decisive influence on the outcome, there was throughout the negotiations at Paris an apparent inclination to disregard her claims and rights. The Big Five seemed to consider Russia as a helpless outsider, to be dismembered and parceled out as if it were enemy territory. In fact, the suspicion has arisen in the minds of Russians that it is the deliberate policy of the Allies to take advantage of Russia's present position to draw her teeth, as it were, and render her helpless and at their mercy for years to come.

With this in mind Russians cannot assent entirely to the premises or conclusions of the editorial article entitled "Bessarabia," in your issue of November 8. In this article you give the impression that there is some historical and ethnical justification for Rumania's seizure of Bessarabia. I trust that you will open your columns to a discussion of this important matter, a matter perhaps vital to future peace in eastern Europe, from a slightly different point of view.

When we examine the matter closely we find that the historical and ethnical bases alleged as an excuse are far from what the Rumanians represent them to be. Bessarabia was never a part of Rumania. When, in 1812, Russia acquired Bessarabia, it was ceded to her by Turkey by the Treaty of Bucharest. At that time Rumania did not exist, and the province in question, a part of Moldavia, was rescued from the overlordship of the Sultan, the first of the Christian provinces of the Balkans to be liberated. The Treaty of Paris, following the Crimean War, returned a portion of Bessarabia to Turkey, but Russia recovered this in 1878.

The status of Bessarabia was therefore established by regular treaty and its inclusion in the Russian Empire as a matter of public right has not been open to question. Whether or not there might be an excuse on ethnical grounds for appealing to the Peace Conference to raise the issue of taking this territory from Russia and giving it to Rumania is an entirely different matter. In this regard the pronouncement of the Russian Political Conference at Paris was clear and unequivocal. Questions concerning the disposition and future status of nationalities included within the limits of the Russian Empire of 1914, with the exception of ethnographical Poland, can only be decided with the consent of the Russian people. While they were ready to declare that the new Russia would be disposed to satisfy legitimate desires of autonomy, and even independence, and to admit under certain conditions the uniting of a national fragment with a state of which this people considers itself a part, no such solution can be adopted until the Russian people are in a position to manifest freely their will and to participate in the settlement of such questions.

But leaving aside for the moment this vital consideration of the participation of the Russian people, what do we find? The population of Bessarabia is about 2,000,000; of these 45.5 per cent. are Moldavians, 27.75 per cent. are Russians, and the remainder divided among Jews, Bulgarians, Germans, Gypsies, etc. It is therefore far from homogeneous, and there is a Moldavian preponderance in but four districts out of eight.

Rumania claims that the people desire to be united with her, and base their claim on the action of the "Sfatul Tseri," a revolutionary assembly, growing out of councils of soldiers and workingmen. This assembly could not claim to be representative and even at that did not declare for annexation to Rumania until after Bessarabia had been invaded by Rumanian troops and the assembly was under their domination, protesting members of which had been shot. As a matter of fact, when the vote was finally taken only 46 out of 162 members participated, and of these 8 voted in the negative. There is not the least foundation for the claim that the people of Bessarabia desire to be annexed to Rumania, and there is good evidence that the opposite is the case. No stronger testimony to this need be adduced than the fact that the Rumanian Government has declined the proposition to hold a plebiscite under neutral auspices. Were Rumania content to leave the question of Bessarabia to be settled on the basis of ascertaining the real wishes of the population and of securing the peaceful consent of the Russian people, she would avoid grave perils in the future.

THE REMAKING OF A MIND. By Henry de Man. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

THIS is a book that every young "Liberal" in America should read. His reaction to it will determine for him whether he actually possesses that open mind which he regards so highly or a mind that resolutely shuts itself to everything that does not chime happily with what is in it already. Let him measure his mind with that of Henry de Man and decide for himself whether his own is worth remaking. Henry de Man's most certainly was.

There was nothing of the parlor play-boy about De Man, he was no amateur of revolution, no pathological sensationalist in the social realm. A Fleming to whom Belgian nationality made faint appeal, he had made of himself not so much an "international" man as a genuinely European man. Germany, France, England, and even the lesser countries of Europe were as much his home as Belgium, not because he had set himself the negative ideal of not loving one country more than another, but because he had intimately led the life of each of these countries, knew their languages, made his own the best their several cultures had to offer, and lived on terms of intellectual comradeship. His cosmopolitanism was the reverse of naive, his hatred of war reasoned on firm historical and biological grounds and not sentimentalized in an ethical quagmire.

Socialism was the goal of his endeavor, but Socialism within the realm of actuality, something to be striven for methodically and with an alert sense of the responsibilities involved. The war found him at the head of the Socialist Young People's Federation, in a position to take definite action looking toward its prevention in the company of the German Socialists, whose organization he had greatly admired, and of the French, with whom, like the Germans, he was on an intimate personal footing. The first stage in the reëducation of his mind began, at tense conferences in Brussels and in Paris, with a realization of the paralysis that had fallen upon the German and Austrian Socialists. He will not believe in their duplicity; lack of personal courage on their part and a pathetically German confidence in the good intentions of their Governments combined to produce in them a state of "funk" when faced by a situation that cried for initiative.

When De Man bade good-bye to Müller at the Brussels station on Sunday, August 2, the last link between the Socialists of Germany and France was severed. The next day the invasion of Belgium began and by afternoon he had volunteered for service in an active infantry regiment. His instinct in so doing—for it was largely instinct in spite of his ability to reason clearly about it afterwards—is excellently illustrative of the soundness of his mind. Casuistry concerning the desirable course of action in the event of a ruffian attack upon one's wife could not entangle a mind like his. The outrage is committed and it makes no difference whether the victim is your own wife or somebody else's or nobody's. In a world that could passively tolerate such an outrage what hope is there of realizing the things implied in any theory of Socialism?

Once in the army the physical activity and a sustaining sense of having chosen the right course gave him strength to wrestle with the lingering doubt, encouraged by the arguments of the internationalists, that this was purely a capitalists' war, in which labor everywhere had no interest save to stop it. The merciless self-examination to which he subjected himself during two years served to tear from his eyes the veil of doctrinaireism. The inability to distinguish between facts and categories, the tendency to apply to actual conditions abstract doctrines derived from quite other conditions, he came to regard as the fault of his earlier thinking and of all the thinking that through various stages eventuates in Bolshevism. Admitting with the internationalists that the war had arisen in an imperialistic and capitalistic world, as it undoubtedly did, he came to be willing, as they did not, to consider the case on its actual merits, refusing to find consolation by throwing the blame for the war upon a purely theoretical category—capital—and by pretending that the threatened destruction of political freedom at the hands of a Germany at once militaristic and servile meant nothing to a cause which demanded political freedom as the first prerequisite to normal development.

De Man deeply and comprehendingly loved Germany and the German people. He loves them still. When he remade his mind he did not remake it in the image of Chauvin. He is ready to argue at length against any rigid conception of a national psychology: he believes that a people like the Germans, largely of peasant tradition, if they could be rapidly and successfully exploited in the interests of militarism, can in not too great a course of time be successfully organized upon some other and better basis. De Man is still a Socialist, but a Socialist, fundamentally, in the sense in which most thinking men are Socialists, that is, he dares to believe that political democracy—in his opinion American political democracy especially—contains within itself the power to purge itself of the faults while retaining the many virtues with which its capitalistic origins have conditioned it. Toward this event he will work. But not with formulas; he is done with them.

Linda Condon

LINDA CONDON. By Joseph Hergesheimer. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.

AMONG the severe or agitated numbers which dominate the concert of our after-war fiction a plain tune of the old time comes welcome on the ear. Indeed, so confused and oft cacophonous is the prevailing ditty that even the more labored strains of yesterday take on the artless charm of a milkmaid's song at dawn. If only we may not have to speak or listen, this time, in terms of world-consciousness and so on, ask what you will of us! We will be good, we promise to enjoy "The Golden Bowl"; we agree not to go to sleep over "The Valley of Decision." Give us the old safe troubles of a world we knew, the pleasant distress of our heroine trying to find her self so that she may be it, the solid comfort of our hero fumbling and grumbling along like any of us, whether towards an understanding of his particular job or a definition of his own soul.

In "Linda Condon" Mr. Hergesheimer has done what is for him, in a sense, a "first" novel. Here for the first time he waves his special magic wand: that of a conjurer bringing the past to us in his two hands, a live thing unimpaired in texture or color or perfume, yet indubitably ensphered in the crystal microcosm of his art. Here he abandons his chief material assets, the two localisms in which his fancy has seemed to possess a natural and in a way proprietary dwelling. One neither hears the rustle of crinoline nor smells oakum in these pages. The "black bang" which introduces Linda and her story takes us back a generation; but we are to grow up with Linda, to the very threshold of that house of war beyond which Mr. Hergesheimer's imagination has not yet stepped. Our study of her is uncomplicated by considerations of the direct relation of the individual to society in the large sense. This is a study of what Linda Condon is and means, in herself and as a type. Heredity plays here an important part, as in Mr. Hergesheimer's earlier stories. Linda adores her blowsy, plebeian mother, born daughter of joy whom only accident differentiates from the dingiest "professional" siren of the streets. Her child Linda adores her. In their wayfaring hotel life her mother's men and her mother's drink and philosophy are alike acceptable as being her mother's. But as the child merges into adolescence another strain in her asserts itself, against all influences: the blood of her father, the cold fastidious aristocrat whose momentary madness has yielded even a legal name for Linda to his passion. She has never known that father, but he lives and grows in her. By instinct she chooses what is decent and comely in dress and bearing, and arms herself with sheer distaste against the amorous approaches of the animal man. Then comes the man to whom her heart answers—a sculptor of great powers which he has not yet realized in marble. She is all his if he will in that first hour of meeting, but he goes his way and for a long time they do not meet. She has taken possession of his fancy, however, and he returns; presently to become her accepted lover. But he is an untamed viking of a man; and before they can be married shocks Linda out of love by a burst of the kind of passion the atmosphere of which has revolted her throughout her young life. For safety she marries the honest, devoted, and by no means stupid Philadelphian cousin who represents her father's point of view. So there is our triangle: Linda's romantic love has gone out of her forever towards the sculptor, and her husband's romantic love for her can never bring it back.

So passes half a generation. Linda has "everything"; a comfortable place among her own kind, money enough, a husband who is also a companion, and two attractive children. In all outward ways she is a success as housekeeper, wife, and mother. But there remains always something cool and aloof about her. She seems still to be waiting for some sort of home-coming or fulfilment. She is always something of the alien in her own house: not even her children touch her nearly. And always, of course, there is the sculptor in the background of her consciousness. He has become famous, has found himself. And he has vindicated his love for her by founding his best work upon it. She has been his inspiration: he makes no concealment of the permanence of his feeling for her. So comes the hour when Linda believes that she sees her destiny, her way home. It is the aging, lonely sculptor who needs her, not the husband to whom, after all, she has given so much. How she is disillusioned of this dream and how later she comes to see that in the indirect service to beauty through her influence upon a great maker of beauty she has fulfilled her own higher destiny, makes up the moving conclusion of the tale. "She had been his power. Linda smiled quietly, in retrospect, at her years of uncertainty, the feeling of waste that had robbed her of peace. How complete her mystification had been!" So we leave her turning quietly back to life, the decline of life, beside the man who has really loved her—to "a region without despair." . . . The performance, as we hinted at the outset, is of the "sophisticated" order, an affair of nuances and compunctions; but all, as we perceive at last, bearing steadily enough towards our main objective. Linda is the least lovable of Mr. Hergesheimer's women; but this is neither her fault nor his. It belongs to that mad moment of her father's, to the fastidiousness which that moment betrayed, and to the devastating vulgarity of the mother who choked the garden of Linda's youth with weeds.

No useful comparison can be made between this and Mr. Hergesheimer's earlier stories. He is, as always, a careful artist in a period when few story-tellers take time or pains to be that.

The Veto Power of Conscience

ROUSSEAU AND ROMANTICISM. By Irving Babbitt. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co.

AS Israel had her prophets, so we have ours; and Mr. Babbitt is one of them. Like other prophets, he draws no flattering picture; his task is one of admonition and denunciation, tempered a little by the cool reflection of the scholar. The chief topic of his book is American romanticism, Rousseau and other historic figures being the corpora vilia which reveal the nature of that capital vice. For we Americans are, as we have long known, more than anything else romantics. Mr. Babbitt's message is new in that he shows how our devotion to science and mechanical efficiency, as well as our inordinate cult of sympathy, are of the same spirit which blossomed in the emotionalism of Rousseau and the will-to-power of Nietzsche. All these are arrayed against the genuine classicism which counsels spiritual equilibrium. "A thing is romantic when it is strange . . . intense . . . unique, etc. A thing is classical, on the other hand, when it is not unique, but representative of a class" (p. 4). The thrilling is the goal of romanticism, the normal and orderly that of classicism; and the thrill may be of bodily sensation, of emotional ecstasy, or of financial or political power—but in any case it breathes excess.

Classicism, checking the lust for sensation, feeling, or power, emphasizes the denying faculty, the "veto power of conscience." Socrates and Plato, as well as Christianity, have stood for this veto power, while romanticism would abolish it. Did not Goethe call the devil "the spirit who always denies"? For the ro-

matic, inhibition is ever bad, all instincts and impulses are inherently good and to be given free play. Let the search for knowledge, pleasure, and power have no limit! Let science, arrogant from material successes, apply its criteria of truth to religion and art; let the instinct of sympathy construct a state which shall so care for the interests of the individual that he will have no need to guide and control his life. Rousseau cultivated his emotions to the extreme in solitude; we exhaust ourselves by excess of social activity. Having failed of happiness in the quest of passion, man seeks happiness in the quest of action and power; the one course is as intemperate as the other. Science, with its universal law of cause and effect, has no use for free, responsible choice. Biological and economic determinism are its last word. "If a working girl falls from chastity, for example, do not blame her, blame her employer. She would have remained a model of purity if he had only added a dollar or two a week to her wage" (p. 156). "The upshot of the whole movement is to discredit moral effort on the part of the individual" (p. 163). Modern education, laying stress on spontaneity, strives simply to unfold the child's nature, and loses sight of the negative factor of discipline. But "the very heart of the classical message, one cannot repeat too often, is that one should aim first of all not to be original, but to be human, and that to be human one needs to look up to a sound model and imitate it" (p. 65). Classicism is thus the only true humanism. But humanism, in turn, cannot live without religion. In contrast to the self-admiration of the romanticist—which Mr. Babbitt finds related to our cult of advertising—is that humility which admits the need of guarding impulse and motive, and which looks up to the great leaders of the past. Such humility grows only in the soil of religion. "In the dark situation that is growing up in the Occident all genuine humanism and religion, whether on a traditional or a critical basis, should be welcome" (p. 379).

All this is brought out in a most interesting way by examples drawn from the history of romanticism. Mr. Babbitt traces that history from the initial self-adoration of the romantic genius to the bitter fruit, romantic melancholy. Certainly the essay reads to the American, consumed with eagerness to advance indiscriminately the cause of the "oppressed," a much needed lesson. One's only fear is that a certain romantic quality in the author may weaken the force of his attack. His utterances do not always show that impartiality of judgment which we expect of a classicist. Thus, his treatment of the love of nature—a romantic trait—is quite unfair: he contemptuously dubs it “mixing one’s self up with the landscape” and he grants to it in the economy of life but a recreative function—“a holiday or week-end view of existence” (p. 289). Must the humanist thus make light of the beauties and sublimities of nature? Does not morality become mere asceticism when it denies serious import to that contemplation of the lilies of the field to which the author of Christianity invited us?

Foolish Old Songs

THE QUEST OF THE BALLAD. By W. Roy Mackenzie. Princeton University Press.

IT has been hastily assumed that the ballad was a closed book. Long ago and far away were the folk poems made which are now so precious even in their ruins. The art died with the last old man or old woman who sang or recited for Walter Scott. Yet the truth is that the ballad crossed the Atlantic and found its way into remote nooks of the new world, and the art of ballad-singing was practised within living memory. The latest investigator to light upon such literary treasure-trove is Professor Roy Mackenzie, and he has unearthed it in what Tom Moore called “chill Nova Scotia’s unpromising strand.” Lighted is hardly the word. He sought diligently till he found it; he digged for it as for buried gold and his quest has been crowned with success.

Pictou County is unique in reputation among the territorial divisions of Canada. In population it is pre-eminently Scottish; and its ability to furnish brains for the rest of the Dominion is a family joke. This, his native county, has been Professor Mackenzie’s happy hunting-ground. For the last six or seven years he has been scouring it for ballads and ballad-singers. His self-imposed task has not always been free from difficulties and hardships. Tact, perseverance, powers of endurance were necessary parts of his equipment. His quest led him into strange places and brought him into contact with some fine old crusted characters. The account of his adventures is pervaded with quiet humor, and will be a shock to those people who are always naively surprised to discover that a professor of English can write the language.

Only a portion of his findings is to be seen in this fascinating volume. Old favorites like “Little Musgrave and Lady Barnard,” “The Cruel Mother,” “Captain Wedderburn’s Courtship” have borne transplantation to the new world well. Popular taste is unchanged for these classics. But Professor Mackenzie impresses one as having vast stores of material in reserve and displaying only a few of his choicest discoveries. Not only did the native ballad-singers treasure up the old; they had the faculty of inventing new. This investigator has brought to light ballads on the battle of Waterloo, the Alma, the Chesapeake and the Shannon, and, more interesting still, ballads on local tragedies like the murders by the Saladin pirates, dating from 1844.

Perhaps even more important than the recovery of so much rich material is the light Professor Mackenzie is able to throw on the psychology of ballad-singers and their audience. He himself refrains from theories, but all interested in the ballad will draw certain conclusions from the facts presented in this book.

There is, in the first place, a distinction between the song and the ballad. The oral ballads are always known as “songs”; only the printed broadsides (which also prevailed in Pictou County) were known as “ballads.” In the next place, ballads and ballad-singing are under a ban. Here as elsewhere religion is the enemy. The popular muse was apt to go rather high-kilted. No doubt Professor Mackenzie’s repertory includes such ballads as one of Lever’s characters proposed to sing after supper, “that would give you a cramp in the stomach.” Another enemy is respectability. Ballad-singing was fashionable in the primitive community still unblighted by modern education, newspapers, and magazines. Now the ballad-singer is looked down on, and feels the popular contempt. Only with difficulty could Professor Mackenzie induce rich custodians of tradition like Easter Ann to part with their treasures, or even to admit possessing them. The bar was fear of ridicule. The songs were “foolish old songs,” and the visitor’s object was to make fun of her for singing them.

Another interesting discovery is the attitude of the ballad-singer and his audience towards the ballad. To both the ballad is not a mere literary recreation; still less a fiction, as it was to Autolyceus. It is not only true, but intensely real. In “singing,” the singer is carried away by his feelings. He wishes he had the villain by the throat; he is ready to weep for the victim, the unfortunate maid. The “audience” punctuates the “singing” with ejaculations or comments which excite the “singer” to greater efforts towards tragic or pathetic effects. It also seems a lawful inference that the ballad-singer transmits only what he believes to be true and valuable for edification.

The question of correctness receives severe punctures. It seems that there cannot be one correct or original form of any ballad. Unconsciously the singer introduces variants into his recitation, even when going over the same material on different occasions. His attitude towards his song is generally uncritical. He transmits without rationalizing strange terms and unaccountable incidents, and he is willing that the auditor should piece out imperfections, and solder the “holes in the ballad” for himself.

Gummere thought it was “impossible to watch a ballad in the making; that merry art is dead.” But, in the case of the Saladin songs, Professor Mackenzie is able to “demonstrate the relationship which pretty constantly exists between the actual ballad and the incident from which it springs.” “Here was a tragedy known to the community; and the community forthwith made woful ballads on it.” “Its avowed aim is to present a true story of an important incident from a point of view as near as may be to that incident.” While the scholars considered the merry art of ballad-making dead, ballads were being made in the good old fashion about the unpromising strand of chill Nova Scotia. The Saladin songs are perhaps the most important discovery of Professor Mackenzie. No future discussion of the origin of ballads can fail to notice them. The “Quest” is a valuable contribution to the study of the elusive literary form which has engaged the attention of so many scholars and charmed such diverse natures as Sidney, Addison, and Scott.

ARCHIBALD MAC MECHAN

MR. MacGregor Jenkins, publisher of the Atlantic Monthly, is a rapid, vivacious, expansive, and fraternizing gentleman, with a strong impulse to flout or scourge anything that prevents a rueful world from remaking itself in his own jovial and cordial image. “Fellow Travelers,” the second of two essays in an exiguous volume, (“Literature with a Large L”; Houghton Mifflin), is an agreeable and sanative paper, preaching fellowship so gaily that the age of the lesson is counterpoised by the youth of the style. This is a theme in which discriminations are scarcely called for. They are called for most emphatically in the subject of “Literature with a Large L,” in which Mr. Jenkins, who wants literature to simplify itself, proves conclusively that criticism may simplify itself too much. So far as the large “L” goes, Mr. Jenkins’s position may be summarized in a word: he is afraid of the capital, lest it should destroy the interest. When the magazine he publishes began to live, its earliest number bore the inscription: “A Magazine of Literature, Art, and Politics” (Literature with a Large “L”). The spirit that provides Literature with a large “L” will be all the dearer to lovers of vivacity that it numbers among its good works in our day the provision of an income for Mr. MacGregor Jenkins.

The sponsors for that periodical, Lowell, Holmes, Longfellow, Emerson, made no secret of their profound and affectionate respect for the thing called literature. There is hardly a sentence in their prose (to mention poetry would be inhumanity towards Mr. Jenkins) which does not show that literature was to them something better than printed speech, a little dearer than bound journalism. In effect, our author's rough-and-ready criticism would reduce the alternatives in literature to two—informality and affectation. This is the trend of his philosophy; Mr. Jenkins very possibly neither sanctions nor perceives that trend. He says that literature "is not—except indirectly—an art." This is quite true in precisely the same sense in which a married man is only indirectly a husband. He was born a bachelor. Literature in the same way was born, not as literature, but as speech or communication. Does that lower, or threaten, its equality as art?

Criticism of the Jenkins school should learn to discriminate between four different things: the sincere, which is vital to all literature; the spontaneous, which is a largesse of nature to favored persons (including Mr. Jenkins); the simple, which, though a merit, and as such always desirable, is often rightly exchangeable for equal or greater merits; and the conversational, which is a matter of occasion and circumstance, like dancing slippers or tennis shoes. There is no obvious place for Milton and Burke, for Tennyson and George Eliot, in Mr. Jenkins's literary scheme; on his shelves they doubtless hold a place. On the subject of Meredith and Pater he maintains a politic silence. Indeed, he scarcely mentions names; in the critical war it is so much safer to attack battalions than individuals. There is an author whom towards the end of his essay he does name with idolatrous homage after tantalizing delay. The reader breathlessly awaits the name of this eminent exemplar of literature that is not markedly or obviously literary, of literature with a small "L." It is Robert Louis Stevenson.

The fine critic, A. E. Gallatin, does a good service in making the handsome quarto "Art and the Great War" (Dutton). His introductory essay is an authoritative guide through a vast maze. The hundred cuts give the reader the chance to judge for himself. It is startling to note how imperfect and inferior our American record is. From the fighting front we have little of note save the painting of S. J. Woolf. It should be no offence to the competent illustrators officially attached to the A. E. F. to say that the theme transcended their powers. They simply couldn't see the thing with the requisite intensity. Either no sufficient artistic counsel was taken in making the appointments, or else the suitable artists were for one reason or another unavailable. What Glackens, Bellows, Sloan, or Luks would have done with the task is now a matter of idle and melancholy speculation. The fact remains that while we have a sheaf of fair illustrations from France, the best work was done at home. Here Luks, for one or two splendid street scenes, perhaps holds the honors, though Childe Hassam and George Bellows and Reuter dahl, each in his kind, are admirable.

A surprise is the marvellous showing of the British. They had the artists, and they made use of them. Orpen, Brangwyn, Nevinson, Muirhead Bone, Eric Kennington have turned out to be military painters of the first rank. D. Y. Cameron, James McBey, Spencer Pryse, Charles Pears, and P. Wyndham Lewis are also notable. We had badly underrated the British in art, as in other regards. If the war is stirring and visible to posterity, the thanks will be to such British artists as we have here named.

The French were too much occupied to make any systematic effort at artistic record. The emergency was such that an artist was just a bayonet. Except for the remarkable air pictures of Farre, the best work was done far from the front, and chiefly in posters. Here, with Forain, Steinlen, Willette, and Lucien Jonas, the French amply maintained their superiority in the field. Holland, with Raemaekers, holds a high place apart. Here if anywhere is the completest moral record of the war.

A fine taste has made the selections in this book, and it will be as welcome to lovers of modern art as to enthusiasts for the war. Considerations of space and convenience have crowded out Russia, Italy, and the new republics of central Europe. Germany's pictorial war record would also be interesting to her conquerors. There must be something worth preserving in these fields, and we hope that Mr. Gallatin will garner it for a companion volume.

The war is responsible for many unexpected juxtapositions, among which may be cited the appointing of an American journalist and world wanderer as lieutenant in the Royal Naval Reserve; assigning him to duty as an official correspondent with the Great Fleet, and, later, on the staff of the Allied Commission charged with carrying out the naval terms of the armistice. Lieutenant Lewis R. Freeman's "To Kiel in the Hercules" (Dodd, Mead) proves how well he used his trained vision while thus employed. Visiting soon after the close of hostilities most of the North Sea and some of the Baltic ports of Germany, together with certain aeroplane and Zeppelin stations, he gained a first-hand impression of actual conditions. "Starving Germany," so far as he could see, he pronounces arrant humbug. As a rule, the Germans with whom he was thrown were, as might have been expected, bullies one moment and bootlicks the next. At some of the commission's inspections, doubtless where there was nothing worth contending for, every assistance was freely offered; at others, all sorts of delays and subterfuges were used to hamper the work. It is difficult to say whether the chief interest in this fascinating book lies in the writer's experiences and observations, his drawing aside the veil which has long hid the bases and methods of hydroplanes and zeppelins engaged in the atrocious work of bombing defenceless communities in Great Britain, or in the confirmation it affords of the essentially brute nature of the Hun.

Of the splendid work recently done by Great Britain's navy fresh accounts appear at short intervals. The latest to come to our notice is "The Heroic Record of the British Navy" by Archibald Hurd and H. H. Bashford (Doubleday, Page). Mr. Hurd has long been before the world as a writer on naval topics. His name on the title page is a warrant of accuracy; one is certain of a good account of the leading incidents at sea of the Great War; of Beatty in the Bight of Heligoland, Craddock off Coronel, Sturdee at the Falklands, the anti-submarine campaign, the Battle of Jutland, and so on. Two defects mar the volume. The first is the contention that Jutland may be classed among England's great naval victories, a contention which is by no means universally conceded; the second is a total and unpardonable lack of maps and plans. Without these, the chapters on Gallipoli and Zeebrugge make heavy reading. The style is clear, simple, and commendable even if falling short of Bennet Copplestone's élan. The facts as stated can be accepted unquestioningly but not the author's views on the naval strategy and conduct of the war, which are unduly partisan. As to these subjects, the British Navy and students of naval warfare are divided into two opposing schools. The final solution of the problem must be left to later days and cooler judgments.

New Singers in Old Operas

THE latest opening of the Metropolitan is always hailed as the most wonderful on record. It matters little who the singers may have been. It matters less what work may have been played and sung. One opening must have outdone all the rest. And that one must, of course, have been the latest. But there was something this year just a trifle forced, I thought, in the loud pœans of the loyal daily newspapers. The "chain gang" of the pressroom (as James Huneker has named the unhappy critics who keep tab on opera) seemed less convinced. Their praises here and there seemed rather strained.

I hate your kill-joys. But I dare not lie. And truth forbids me to admit that the first week or two of opera this season seemed as brilliant as they might—and should—have been. I could not rave over the performance, on the first night, of Puccini's well-worn "Tosca." Nor did the appearance of the artists in the cast—which included Scotti, still an incomparable Scarpia, Caruso as Caradossi, and Geraldine Farrar as the protagonista of the story—excite me greatly.

Society was out in force as usual. The "fans" (and claqueurs who frequent the standing spaces) clapped and shouted. But, on the whole, the opening seemed the least bit dull. So did the programmes of the first and second week. Too old and dull. The visit of the Prince was a delightful incident, a splash of red to warm a drab-hued background.

As years run on, and no second Hammerstein appears to challenge the management of the Metropolitan, the taste and judgment of New Yorkers in the opera house do not improve. The same stereotyped applause rewards the same pet "stars"; while strangers have to fight their way to fame, though they are gifted, as some are, by art and nature. For example, Gabriella Besanzoni, a mezzo-soprano of great charm and skill, with a most lovely voice, aglow with warmth and feeling and blessed with temperament. In Buenos Ayres and in other cities which love opera la Besanzoni is a popular idol. But on the evening of her debut here, almost unheralded, as Amneris, it took the audience, and some critics, a long time to realize that they were listening to an unusual singer and an exceptional artist. The friends and partisans of this or that Amneris crept into corners and did their worst, poor dears, between the acts, to undo the débutante. To some who heard her, though, she gave great joy, by the mellow beauty of her tones in the middle register, by the fire and vigor which informed her acting, and by the authority with which she trod the boards, as to the manner born. She will, I am sure, delight us more and more, as she grows easy in her new environment.

The addition of the American tenor, Orville Harrold, to the company at the Metropolitan is also welcome. When he has overcome his tendency to force his upper notes and when he phrases perfectly, Mr. Harrold will do credit to himself. We need a first-rate tenor to alternate in the casts with the sublime Caruso. Martinelli is not always quite ideal in the parts he sings. In "Aida" he was not a flawless Radames. Had he offended at the Scala, as he did here on a certain night—more especially in his "Celesta Aida"—he would have heard of it. Here only a few critics seemed to mind his frequent faults of intonation and betrayals of the composer's plain intentions.

A fact, of more than incidental interest, has been the appearance at the Metropolitan of Albert Wolff as Pierre Monteux's successor. It would be less than fair to judge the new French conductor by one test or by a second test. Mr. Wolff put spirit into "Faust" and brightened "Carmen." But, like all strangers, he has still to adjust himself to the vast spaces of the Metropolitan Opera House.

As for the repertory vouchsafed us in the first fortnight of the season, with one exception it was drawn from works too hackneyed to need comment. We have made our minds up, in our many different ways, as to the merits and defects of "Tosca," "Faust," "Aida," "La Bohème," and "Trovatore," which were unblushingly all packed into the opening week. Nor need we waste much space or time on the discussion of such work as "Boris Godounow," "L'Oracolo," "Pagliacci," "Carmen," "Madama Butterfly," and (heaven preserve us) our old friend, "Lucia," which, with "La Forza del Destino," were provided for the second week. It may be hoped that things will not stick in old ruts long. For that would mean that the once famous Metropolitan had lost its position in the world as the chief home of opera. The Metropolitan must not stand still. It must go forward—or it will slip backward. But this is less apparent to the insiders and frequenters of that opera house than to those friendly but unprejudiced outsiders who are not hypnotized by names.

The popularity of the Metropolitan rests far too largely, as some think (and I believe), on the prestige of two or three much vaunted singers. Of these the most important is Caruso. And though, at forty-six, he may still charm, it might be wise not to trust blindly to one magnet—even a Caruso. Great opera houses live, not by stars only, but chiefly if not wholly by their repertories. This is the truth, which should not be forgotten, even when the Metropolitan seems rich and prosperous. It was through ignoring it that the late Heinrich Conried provoked the fight with the late Oscar Hammerstein.

The repertory. What has been added to it this season? One work, so far, a revival of "La Juive," the much over-rated effort of the French Jew, Halévy—or, to give him his real name, Jacques François Fromental Elie Levi. "La Juive," composed at a time when Meyerbeer was idolized in Paris, apes in a way the Meyerbeerian methods. But Halévy had not his rival's power, and, though the theme with which his librettist, Scribe, supplied him was melodramatic to a point that approached absurdity, he found it easier to write music for that theme, which was more suited to the needs of opera-comique than to the purposes of "grand" opera. There is little or no grandeur in "La Juive"; and, in its most tragic-seeming moments, it is only lachrymose. The general tendency of Halévy toward bathos, when one expects poignancy or pathos, soon grows tedious.

And yet the librettist had accomplished his part well enough. He had drawn his characters with no small skill. His tale was lurid and its end sensational. A heroine boiled in oil, to please the Church. A Jew who avenges Israel's wrongs on a weak Cardinal. The Ghetto and a Catholic Court at Constance. A lover who betrays a proud Princess while, as he fancies, he goes courting a fair Jewess. The Inquisition and the Hebrew Passover. Love, hate, and doubt, and jealousy and death. Scribe mixed these things as he knew how to mix them, allowing opportunities for thrills, and—ballets. But Halévy failed to provide the thrills, and what he invented in the way of ballet was, let us say, negligible. Yet, thanks to a few songs for the two tenors who are prominent in the cast (the Jew Eléazar and the Christian Leopold); thanks to the florid airs for the Princess, and a few more airs for Rachel, who, as the supposed Jewess, is condemned to death by her real father, the red Cardinal; and thanks, maybe, to the many chances it allows for pageantry, "La Juive" has long maintained its place in opera in France and Germany. For years it charmed the New Orleans opera-goers. It was first sung here, in September, sixty years ago, at the Academy of Music, by what was quaintly called the "Grand Historical and Romantic French Opera Company" (under the management of Dryane & Company). The Eléazar was on that occasion a singer named Tabardi, while the Rachel was Madame Faye-Fauschette. In after years "La Juive" was often given at the Metropolitan, by the Germany company which sang

there in the '30's. And later still a New Orleans company revived it—for one night or more—on Broadway (if I mistake not, at the Casino).

With that we could have laid "La Juive" aside. It was not kind, though it was clever, of the Italian management at the Metropolitan to dig up the dead bones of the old opera and hand them back to us. The Italians, as we know, play their own game well in the world of opera; and if it does not always suit the French game, tant pis for France. But, in this instance, what harms France harms us. We have been hoping to hear modern styles in French as in Italian forms of opera.

CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

Drama

I WISH to put together four facts which show the value put upon authors in dramatic circles. Mr. W. D. Howells is the author of the novel on which the "Rise of Silas Lapham," the latest offering of the Theatre Guild, is based. Mr. Lee Simonson is the designer of the scenery and costumes. On the programme Mr. Simonson's name appears in capitals, Mr. Howells's in small type. The declared object of the undertaking is the manifestation of respect to Mr. Howells.

In Mr. Howells's excellent book Tom Corey and Penelope Lapham, aristocrat and parvenu, love each other. Both are in a sense the children of "paint," but the palette has scruples about the pot. To the social barrier is added a moral hesitation. The young man was supposed to have been courting the girl's sister, a supposition in which the two girls and the two families coincided. Another moral question disturbs the Lapham family. The father's fortune is imperiled, and in the tottering of his fortune his honor reels. He is offered a large sum by an ignorant buyer for a worthless property—an offer which his resurgent manhood finally rejects. The only real bond between these two situations in the book is that the protagonists are father and daughter. Now Miss Lillian Sabine's treasure-trove, the fortunate discovery that creates the play, is the articulation of these plots by making the father's surrender to temptation necessary to the satisfaction of the daughter's heart. The ease with which this ligature is made is proof enough that the failure of Mr. Howells to make it is wholly voluntary, but that fact does not hinder Miss Sabine from scoring as playwright.

The success, however, has its price. The question of sisterly conscience, dramatically and ethically paramount for Mr. Howells, is almost superfluous for Miss Sabine. Its deposition from the primary place almost subverts the novel, and its retention in the form of prologue or episode disintegrates and embarrasses the play. One might call the first two acts a kind of attic in which Miss Sabine, leasing a mansion from Mr. Howells, has stowed away that part of the furniture and portraits which was useless or obstructive to her own purposes. Her drama is all in the third act: the first two acts, though bright in parts, are logically mere introduction; the fourth is after-piece.

I revert to the main situation. Penelope Lapham is engaged to Tom Corey; Silas Lapham's fortune totters. Silas promises Mrs. Corey, the mother of Tom, that the engagement shall be broken unless the fortune is retrieved. The chance for retrieval presents itself with diabolical timeliness in the form of a corrupt bargain. The battle is on between conscience and paternity. To be sure, he might evade this battle by retracting his pledge or rather vaunt to Mrs. Corey, and marrying his penniless child to her not unprosperous suitor, but the whole sense and significance of the death-grapple between honesty and fatherhood rests on the assumption that his pride is adamant, that no third exit is available to a man of Silas Lapham's character.

In the fourth act the impossibility has become possible. Silas Lapham, reduced to poverty by honor, telegraphs for Tom Corey. Pride is not adamant, and the stringency of the third-act alternative—in other words, the whole life of the play—vanishes like smoke. When characters get down from their high horses, plays, too, become pedestrian. Miss Sabine is too fond of reconsiderations. Penelope refuses Tom Corey in Act II; this is undone between Acts II and III. She refuses him again between Acts III and IV; this is undone in the fourth act. The Penelope of the Odyssey, it will be remembered, always unraveled at night the web she had woven in the daytime.

The morality of the play (putting aside the novel) is of two formations, a new and an old. In the last act Penelope cries out against sacrifices which one isn't strong enough to live up to, and exclaims, in contempt of tradition, when it is suggested that her lover may be happy in her absence: "I hope not." These rearings and demi-voltes are very much in the modern vein, very much in the Howells vein, for on this topic Mr. Howells is modern. But nothing can be older or more cloying than the confectionery to which the Laphams are treated in the beginning of the same act as a recompense for their honesty. In real life one doesn't fall from Golconda into Arcady.

Moreover, the moral screw which the uncompromising Persis Lapham applies to the conscience of her husband grates a little even upon minds to which that terrible old morality is dear. Morality is inexorable, we grant, but much else besides morality is inexorable. Even the upright may shrink a little from the narrowness and severity of a point of view which turns life into a gymnasium for the conscience.

After all criticisms a value finally inheres in the play. Silas Lapham, in the Howells book, is a sound American type in a genuine American situation, and Miss Sabine, whom so many of the delicacies in the novel have eluded, has been fortunate in the power to arrest and retain this fact of paramount significance. That suspension between good and evil, which is perhaps the moral state of the majority of the men in Silas Lapham's situation, is scarcely imagined by a public by whom extremes of probity and wickedness are so readily imaginable. Let us be just to Miss Sabine. Her play is, artistically, a crude affair, a rough product of the dilapidation of a strong novel; but, after all, it tells us something, and that is what plays are for.

Mr. James K. Hackett's Silas Lapham may be described with some qualifications as successful. He paints the manners of Silas much better than his passions, and he is not thoroughly alive to the fact that the manners of such a character are designed largely as a muffler for his passions. It is impossible to believe, for instance, that Silas Lapham would have spoken three-fourths of Act III in the vibrant bass, by no means ineffective in itself, which Mr. Hackett has taken over from his romantic parts. Miss Marjorie Vonnegut destroyed Mr. Howells's Penelope at a stroke, and put in her place a bright, fluttered, attractive creature with a quaintness that seemed to have crept upward from her flounces into her face and voice. Miss Grace Knell was winning as Irene, and Miss Grace Henderson put as much life into Persis Lapham as was able to draw breath within the chain-mail of her invincible morality. The very elementary subtlety which Mr. Walter Howe was able to impart to his agreeable Bromfield Corey would have afforded the real Bromfield Corey some genuinely subtle delectations.

O. W. FIRKINS

Mr. Eugene Walter's ultra-conservative labor-play, the "Challenge," is peculiarly fortunate in its entourages. It remains in Boston presumably long enough to participate in the triumph of Governor Coolidge. It returns to New York in time to pasture its soul on the arrest, in a single raid, of a thousand persons by the Lusk committee.

A Revolutionary Idea—

“In 1886 the individual Motor Drive was advocated and adopted by the executives of the present Crocker-Wheeler Company and Charles Curtis.

“This was the starting point of the urge for individual Electric Motor drive—an idea that is now applied to the motor driven vacuum cleaner, washing machine, sewing machine, etc., with marked benefits and economies.”

Review Reprints

“Cutting Down The Corpse”

This article on THE MENACE OF INFLATION, written by George E. Roberts of The National City Bank, formerly Director of the Mint, appeared in THE REVIEW November 22, 1919. Frederick Strauss, of J. & W. Seligman & Co., New York, says of it:

“I think that this article ought to have the widest possible circulation as it is a clear exposition of the present situation, so simple in form as to be capable of being understood by anyone having the slightest knowledge of the subject.”

10 copies or less, free on request. Larger quantities at cost.

“The Creed”

A well-known educational institution recently sent out 5,000 copies of a folder in which it reprinted “THE CREED” of THE REVIEW. This creed has now been reprinted on cards of postcard size.

Up to 500 free on request. Larger quantities at cost.

Gift Books

THE old-fashioned gift-book, which nobody cared to read, and nobody with taste cared to look at, has vanished. In its place the publishers offer books which make pleasing Christmas gifts, with interesting text and suitable illustrations in color, in line, or in half-tone.

The following books may appeal especially to motorists who are planning trips for the summer: Helen W. Henderson's "A Loiterer in New England" (Doran), John T. Faris's "Seeing Pennsylvania" (Lippincott), Robert Shackleton's "The Book of Philadelphia" (Penn. Pub. Co.), Octavia Roberts's "With Lafayette in America" (Houghton), with its historic interest; Albert G. Robinson's "Old New England Doorways" (Scribner), mainly a book of plates, and James R. Simmons's "The Historic Trees of Massachusetts" (Marshall Jones Co.). The last should attract tourists, lovers of historic towns and of arboriculture.

An example of beautiful book making is Joseph Pennell's "Etchers and Etching" (Macmillan). Two volumes on household decoration are: "The Practical Book of Interior Decoration" (Lippincott), by H. D. Eberlein, and "Color Schemes for the Home, and Model Interiors" (Lippincott), by H. W. Frohme and Alice and Bettina Jackson.

For travel or sport in distant countries there are Leo E. Miller's "In the Wilds of South America" (Scribner), Wilfred N. Beaver's "Unexplored New Guinea" (Lippincott), and Frederick O'Brien's "White Shadows in the South Seas" (Century). All are elaborately illustrated. "The Gelsa Girl" (Lippincott) is written with unconscious humor by T. Fujimoto, and adorned with Japanese pictures. The title of Warren H. Miller's "Canoeing, Sailing and Motor Boating" (Doran) suggests its proper recipients, while Zane Grey's "Tales of Fishes" (Harpers) describes adventures with the big game fish of the Florida coast.

Ernest Peixotto, a captain during the war, has given an artist's description of "The American Front" (Scribner). For the lover of dogs Gergette Maeterlinck describes "Maeterlinck's Dogs" (Dodd), and the book is furnished with amusing pictures. A book of solid reading, of the most entertaining kind, especially for men who care for hunting and life outdoors, is J. G. Millais's "Life of Frederick Courtenay Selous" (Longmans). Selous, the original of Rider Haggard's "Allan Quatermain," was linked with America through his friendship and correspondence with Theodore Roosevelt. Admiral Fiske's autobiography, "From Midshipman to Rear-Admiral" (Century), is another book with an especial appeal to men. "Rudyard Kipling's Verse; Inclusive Edition, 1885-1918" (Doubleday) contains all of his poems I have ever seen, some which I have never seen in a book before, and one or two which are new to me.

Copyright, 1919, and published by The National Weekly Corporation, 140 Nassau Street, New York, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, May 15, 1919, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879. Subscription price, $5.00 a year.

"THE Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, in common with the businessmen of the whole nation, believes that as a people we are now confronted, in the world of morals and in the world of trade, with a crisis similar to that which we faced on the 6th of April, 1917." Such is the opening sentence of a statement upon the Treaty situation, which is in every way a model of what such a statement should be. As the declaration appears in full in our advertising columns, it calls for little comment here except that of unstinted praise. It makes no effort to adjudicate blame. It states so impressively the awful need with which the whole world is confronted, and brings home so forcibly the duty of the United States in relation to it, that it is difficult to see how any man, unless he is radically and irreconcilably opposed to the Treaty, can fail to be stirred by the appeal. We trust that the example of this great body of New York businessmen will be followed in all parts of the country. The statement closes with these resolutions:

That some form of international covenant which seeks to prevent war is a moral necessity;

That the differences between the President and the Senate should be composed without delay by such mutual concessions regarding reservations as may be necessary in the Treaty to secure ratification.

There can be no doubt that this faithfully represents the dominant sentiment of the country; let no time be lost in translating that sentiment, as the New York Chamber of Commerce has for its part done, into an unmistakable and overwhelming demand.

PARTICULAR offense to the pure minds of Republican Senators has been given by Lloyd George. Speaking in England of the need of keeping party politics in the background until peace was placed on a solid foundation, he referred in his slapdash and indiscreet way to the United States. There partisan motives had asserted themselves, he declared, in an attempt to undo the work of the Peace Conference.—New York Evening Post.

The British Premier may have been "slap-dash and indiscreet," and it may also be true, as the Evening Post says, that his remarks have caused the Republican Senators to "hold up hands of holy horror." But Lloyd George was not so slap-dash or so indiscreet as to undertake to lay the blame of what has happened exclusively upon one party. He was talking about the inestimable advantage which England had derived from the suspension of party wrangles during the war, an advantage which had been attained by means of a coalition instituted at the very beginning of the conflict. He was urging the continuance of the party truce until the crisis was completely over, and was pointing to the danger that an abandonment of it would bring on, as exemplified by our experience here. The implication was that not the superior virtue of British public men, as compared with Americans, but the actual and formal coöperation of all parties in the conduct of the Government was the secret of the harmony which had been attained. "We got the League of Nations through the House of Commons . . . in a single night," he declared, "while months of burning and bitter conflict have been spent upon it in America." And he pointed to the contrast as "a warning against the danger of renewing party conflict." The Review would be the last to say that the spectacle of party conflict that has been witnessed in the Senate is one that can be thought of without severe censure and bitter regret; but it would hesitate a good while before asserting that the blame for it attaches in any greater degree, all things considered, to the Republican side than to the Democratic.

UNDER our governmental system a coalition of the character of that which obtained in England is out of the question, owing to the separation of executive and legislative powers. But Mr. Wilson, throughout the war, went to the extreme limit of possibility in the opposite direction. He made no attempt whatever to give Republicans the feeling that they had any part in the conduct of affairs. It is possible that the President felt that only in this way could he attain that efficient control which he thought necessary to the successful prosecution of the war. Whether right or wrong, however, his attitude was accepted as final by the Republicans, and from the declaration of war to the armistice they gave as loyal support to the President as did the members of his own party. Without any formal coalition, there was a virtual suspension of party conflict for eighteen months. The first overt break in this understanding was made by the President himself, in his memorable appeal to the voters, on the eve of the elections of last year, to support his policy by the election of a Democratic Congress. But serious as this break was, it might have involved no grave continuing consequences had the President in his dealings with the negotiation of peace manifested any desire to obtain the coöperation of Republican leaders—whether in or out of the Senate—or even in a general way to cultivate their good will. And on top of all this he and his upholders persistently ignored the existence of any honest difference of opinion upon the fundamental questions involved in our acceptance of the League of Nations—questions which involve a radical change in the relation of America to the rest of the world, quite unlike anything that England has had to consider. If men were angels they might be wholly uninfluenced in their conduct by the circumstance that their existence had been steadily overlooked, and that when at last it was recognized, everything that they said or did was incontinently dismissed as either fatuous or dishonest. But if men were angels there would be no war, and consequently there would be no trouble about treaties of peace.

PRESIDENT WILSON'S admirable statement of the character of the Government's proposal to the miners, and of the reasons for it, has just been made public. As we go to press, it seems probable that the mine workers will accept the proposal; the operators appear already to have done so. The exact ground upon which Mr. Garfield's determination of the wage-advance at 14 per cent. rested is now made entirely clear to the public, as well as to the parties most directly concerned. It is not only that 14 per cent. covers, as nearly as may be estimated, what remained to be covered in the advance of the cost of living, but also that the operators find themselves able to meet this advance without a rise in the price of coal. Over and above this, there stands the offer to have the whole question of mine operation thoroughly and impartially investigated. To refuse a temporary cessation of conflict, with the prospect of a sound permanent adjustment, at a time when such obstinacy would mean unspeakable distress to all the people of the country, would be such flagrant defiance of public sentiment as few labor leaders, we imagine, will be willing to make themselves responsible for.

THE New York Globe protests in strong language, but none too strong, against the action of the Post Office Department in refusing to the New York Call the privilege of admission to the second class of mail matter. The Department bases its refusal upon the assertion that the Call is not a "newspaper or other periodical publication" within the meaning of the law governing mailable matter of the second class, it being in conflict with the act of June 15, 1917, the espionage act as amended by the act of May 16, 1918, as well as Section 211 of the penal code as amended.

Whether the laws referred to afford justification for this denial or not, the cutting off of the usual privileges of circulation of a newspaper by mere administrative fiat is an outrage not only against the principle of freedom of the press but against the elementary instincts of fair play. If the law does justify it, it ought to be changed; like more than one other thing that has happened recently, this is applying to comparatively normal conditions what nothing but the clear necessities of war furnished a real warrant for. It is well to remember, however, that arbitrary power in this matter of the second-class privilege was exercised by the Post Office Department long before the war. A notorious instance of it occurred a dozen or fifteen years ago in the case of a little Socialist magazine published in California. It is such sporadic acts of bureaucratic folly that do more than anything else to give color to the extravagant charges made by radicals of the sweeping suppression of free speech.

WITTER BYNNER, Percy Stickney Grant, Frederic C. Howe, David Starr Jordan, Dudley Field Malone, Glenn E. Plumb, etc.—it's the Committee of Forty-eight we mean—have taken the lot of the "plain people" into their own exclusive hands. The only thing that is left for the rest of us is to hope that the "liberals" in their overzeal may make the present conditions of the plain people appear so disreputable that the plain people will rise up and smite them.

THE issue of the closed shop is sharply joined in the building trades of New York City. The Structural Iron Workers' Union demands nothing short of a hundred per cent. union basis in both the fabrication and the erection of iron and steel work. Added pressure, under threat of sympathetic strikes in other trades, comes from the Building Trades Employers' Association. The Iron League Erectors' Association stands firmly for the traditional open shop, under which for thirteen years New York has avoided labor trouble, with wages, it is claimed, above union rates, and with increased economy in the cost of erection amounting to something like twenty-five per cent. Reports from cities like Chicago and Cincinnati, where the closed shop is established, clearly indicate that whatever may be gained a good deal is lost through continual squabbles between the different trades, between carpenters and iron workers, plumbers and steamfitters, between any two, indeed, of the many groups that must cheerfully cooperate if a building is to rise. In a business so organized the closed shop appears at its worst, giving rise to trouble for which the responsibility can not be placed nor effective remedy applied. To judge from the past, such control as would be exercised by the Iron Workers' Union is not of the sort that the public may look forward to without misgiving.

DR. SCHIFFER, the German Minister of Justice, does not believe that Prussian influence on the nation should be curtailed. "It would be an act of injustice to destroy Prussia, without which German thought would not have blossomed in the past." With all due reverence to Dr. Schiffer's clear discrimination between just and unjust, guaranteed by his holding that particular office, we venture to differ with him in the appreciation of Prussia's share in the development of German thought. It seems more just to say that the failure of the early blossom to bear its promised fruit is due to that blasting spirit of Prussia under which individual thinking shriveled. But apart from the question whether Dr. Schiffer is right or not, his statement is a bold disavowal of the spirit of the new Constitution which, according to its maker, Professor Preuss, contains provisions intended to facilitate the formation of new free German states and thereby to promote the process of decomposition of the one Prussian State, whose hegemony proved so fatal to the nation.

PROFESSOR PREUSS is no admirer of what he calls, in characteristic German jargon, the "einzelstaatlichen Sondergeist," the particularism of the individual states. But knowing that mere legislation can not, by one stroke of the pen, drive out that spirit from the minds of the various German races, he tries to slacken the tension which it causes between them by creating the possibility of fresh divisions and combinations. Prussian particularism he holds chiefly responsible for the tenacious survival of these interstate animosities, and he trusts that, as a consequence of Prussia's disintegration, state particularism will gradually yield to a general feeling of the oneness of all German lands. In other words, the chief obstacle in the way towards the one and undivided German Republic which the maker of the Constitution had in mind, is the continuance of Prussia. It is strange, therefore, to hear the man at the head of the Department of Justice utter thoughts so entirely at variance with the spirit of the Constitution for whose maintenance he is responsible.

A STILL more flagrant disavowal of solemnly pledged obligations is the statement made by Baron Kurt von Lersner that "the Germans would never consent, protocol or no protocol, to give up the officers accused of war crimes." If by "the Germans" he simply meant the people, the remark was uncalled for, as the head of the German Peace Mission is only the chargé d'affaires of the German Government and not the spokesman of the nation. If he meant to imply that the Government, in compliance with the alleged demand of the people, will in any case refuse to carry out a provision of the Treaty which that Government itself has duly signed and the people's representatives have ratified, he either slandered his mandators or, if he had authority for his statement, showed them once more lacking in the sense of honor. It is not for the German Government to refuse to carry out the obligations of the Treaty on the plea that the extradition of the officers would stir the indignant people into revolt. If there were strong evidence for the justice of that fear, it might be wise tactics on the part of the Entente not to insist on the handing over of those men, but it could never exonerate the Government from its duty of compliance. Noske, by declaring his intention to recommend a refusal, is evidently trying his hand at the game which Scheidemann played without success in the days immediately preceding the signing of the Peace Treaty.

INTELLECTUAL radicals are a curious tribe. Some of them tried their best to keep this country out of the war, and all of them strove to bring about a negotiated, inconclusive peace. So far the logic is impeccable, for they sincerely believed that talk could put up a better fight than arms. But their advice was not followed, the conflict was prolonged to a military decision. And now they, who were constantly saying that war, the greatest of evils, could not beget good, are railing because a perfect world has not emerged as the result of it. Their case becomes still more curious when it is remembered that they are internationalists to whom the idea of a nation means nothing, except for the right to exercise self-determination, and are at the same time, in their own conceit, the only element in this great broad land that is striving to restore the spirit of "old America." Yet if there is one thing which was characteristic of old America it is pride in our achievements as a self-contained nation.

THE action of the trustees of Columbia University in declaring what is apparently a fifty per cent. increase in salaries beginning July 1, 1920, is remarkable in several particulars. Whatever may be the disadvantages of committing the educational destinies of a great university to a group largely composed of businessmen, none but businessmen would have had the courage, or the vision, to take so long a step forward. No group of professors, however underpaid and the reverse of humble, would have thought of asking for so much. A scale which starts Assistant Professors at $3,000 and Associate Professors at $4,500, and according to which the salaries of Professors range from $6,000 to $8,000, and even $10,000 in certain cases, is quite sufficient to enable them to keep their heads above the risen tide of prices. If the tide later subsides the professor will find himself endowed with that measure of release from small material worries which, it has always been granted, is necessary for the effective discharge of his proper work. If the added burden to university finances results in rearrangements of work by which an increase in the number of students will not tend quite so rapidly as in the past to multiply the number of professors, that too will be a gain. The method by which the funds necessary for the new salaries are to be obtained seems sound. The student will get full value for slightly increased tuition fees.

MR. HENRY C. FRICK'S will forms a splendid continuation of what America can unhesitatingly point to as peculiarly her own tradition in the uses of great wealth. It was George Peabody, more than any other one man, that made familiar to all the world the idea of wide philanthropies being the natural object of the accumulation of great fortunes, though of course there had been notable examples before his time. The scale of this munificence has been growing by leaps and bounds, but the devotion of money and art treasures to an aggregate amount of something like $120,000,000 in value is still an event of exceptional moment. Of greatest interest in New York is the bestowal upon the public of Mr. Frick's great art collection; but hardly second to it is the bequest of $15,000,000 to Princeton University. The possibilities of this sudden enlargement of Princeton's endowment, coinciding as it does with the movement to raise a similar sum by general subscriptions, is calculated to fire the imagination. What will Princeton do with it? Mr. Frick appears to have imposed no restrictions on the use of the money. What superb results might flow from putting it all into men—the biggest men that can be got, and with the fullest opportunity to make the most of their powers!

THE "Leipziger Neueste Nachrichten" reports that "Professor Gustav Eberlein has completed his colossal busts of Marx, Lassalle and Bebel." Even the imperial artists, official immortalizers of the Hohenzollerns, are obeying the new demand for re-orientation. The wooden, nail-studded Hindenburg has been hauled down from his pedestal, and the red generals of a former generation are resuscitated in white marble. The images of the defender and the assailants of monarchism have nothing in common except their size. The Teutonism which unites these four can only be expressed in forms colossal.

The President's Health and Democratic Duty

THE visit of Senators Fall and Hitchcock at the White House has cleared the atmosphere. It has set at rest all question of the President's ability to fulfil the necessary duties of his office. There is no longer any doubt that he is mentally as capable as ever of deciding any question upon which he may undertake to pass judgment. All talk of devolving his authority upon the Vice President, or upon any one else, is at an end. And indeed that question, though it has been more or less agitated during the past ten or twelve weeks, has never reached an acute stage. What has been gained by the recent interview with the two Senators is that the country is, for the time at least, relieved of the manifold rumors which, in the absence of authoritative medical information, kept springing up, as they were bound to do. Such information is still absent; but the Senators' visit has doubtless been more conclusive, upon the public mind, than any formal assurance from his medical attendants would have been.

But the question of Mr. Wilson's ability to discharge the duties which of necessity devolve upon him as President is far from being the whole of the question raised by his continued illness. It is evident—indeed, more evident than ever—that he can not, except at imminent risk to his health and perhaps his life, undergo severe or prolonged strain. This does not make it impossible for him to continue to exercise the full authority of President of the United States; but it does make it impossible for him to continue to bear, in any real or proper way, the burden that he had of his own will assumed, and which until his physical breakdown he had consistently borne. Throughout the proceedings at Versailles he was the sole repository of his country's power, the sole arbiter of his country's policy; and since his return, the action of the representatives of his party in the Senate—with the exception of a handful of dissenters—has been the faithful reflection of his will. This state of things has been dependent, of course, not upon the authority inherent in his office, but upon the voluntary assent of the Democratic Senators. That assent may have been wholly creditable to them, or it may not; but in any case it must have been supposed to rest upon two assumptions—first, that the President's judgment was based upon complete command of the facts and possibilities of the situation, and secondly, that as the situation developed he would be able to exert the full measure of his personal powers in coping with its difficulties.

To allege anything of this kind now would be manifestly absurd. That responsibility for their own action which the Democratic Senators so completely threw upon the President, they are now under the clearest possible obligation to assume themselves. And it is the words of no other than Mr. Wilson himself that furnish them with the most imperative reason for assuming it. Nearly half a year has passed since his return from Europe. No man's warning of the dangers of delay in completing the war settlement was more solemn or more emphatic than his. Those dangers have not diminished with time; on the contrary, at no moment have they been more acute than they are to-day. The condition of Europe is more involved politically, and more serious economically, now than it was six months ago. There is no telling what new trouble any day may bring forth. Mr. Wilson would be the last to say that the prolongation of unsettlement is a matter of indifference, or a thing to be looked upon otherwise than with the gravest misgiving. The question for the Democratic Senators—as for all of us—is not what we might wish had been done a year ago, or six months ago, but what can be done now.

The Senate, in the exercise of its unquestionable Constitutional right, has refused assent to the Treaty unless accompanied by important reservations. Even if this position were due solely to perversity or partisanship, it would be a fact that has to be reckoned with; in reality, however, the resistance to unqualified acceptance owes the great strength it has manifested to the support of men as sincere in their estimate of the dangers of the Covenant as are its advocates in their estimate of its benefits. But that is not the point; the fact that stands out too plain to be disputed is that the only possible way in which the Treaty can be ratified is through the acceptance of nearly all of the Lodge reservations.

It seems plain that the President will make no move toward a settlement on this basis. And it must further be admitted that negotiation for any kind of compromise is impossible unless there be some kind of understanding as to what the President's attitude will be in the event of the compromise being adopted by a two-thirds vote of the Senate. In the face of the prediction so confidently and defiantly made by adherents of the Administration, in the face of endless abuse and ridicule, Mr. Lodge has become master of the situation—made so by the obstinate refusal of the Administration forces to respond to any advances on the part of Republican moderates. Naturally enough, he will decline to enter into a parley that may lead nowhere. But from all this it does not follow that nothing can be done. On the contrary, it seems clear to us that one thing can be done with great prospect of success; a thing which demands of the Democratic Senators only the resumption—than which nothing could be more natural in the circumstances—of their individual responsibility and their individual functions as Senators of the United States. Let them determine, according to their best judgment, what modifications of the Lodge resolutions are on the one hand the least that would make the President's assent reasonably possible, and on the other hand the most that the majority of the Republican Senators would be willing to concede. And then let them place the situation before the President. Let them say to him, in effect:

"We have loyally done our best to get the Treaty ratified without reservations, as you desired. It has proved to be impossible. Nor is it now possible to obtain ratification by means of those reservations which you yourself, three months ago, declared to be unobjectionable, provided they were not made an integral part of the act of ratification. It is now certain, beyond peradventure, not only that reservations must be included in the act of ratification, but that they must be made more drastic than the ones you then contemplated.

"We have given to the whole question the most careful consideration. The reservations we have formulated represent, we are fully convinced, the utmost deviation from the Lodge reservations upon which there is any possibility of securing a two-thirds vote of the Senate for the Treaty. We are convinced, too, that, however they may impair the force of the Covenant, they still leave it with great potentialities for good, and that they will not be objected to by any of the great Powers with which we were associated in the war.

"We do not wish to interfere with your prerogative, or to dictate your decision. We simply lay the facts before you. It is for you to decide, according to your own judgment, whether you think it best to have the Treaty ratified with these reservations or not to have it ratified at all. If you decide for the latter alternative, that ends the matter; and for this conclusion you will have assumed full responsibility. If, on the other hand, you signify your willingness to accept these reservations rather than abandon the Treaty altogether, we will place the proposal before the Republican Senators, in the confident expectation that it will command the approval of enough of them to assure a two-thirds majority for the Treaty. We believe that this would be their spontaneous response; but if it were not, they would be impelled to it by the consciousness that rejection of so reasonable a proposal would bring upon their party the overwhelming condemnation of the country."

Is this not the course which a manly recognition of Senatorial responsibility clearly dictates? Can there be any reasonable doubt that it would accomplish the object for which it was designed? And is it too much to hope that Senators will at last rise to the level of their duty and their opportunity?

Money and Prices

AMONG the comments called forth by Mr. George E. Roberts's article on "The Financial Situation," in the Review for November 22, is a criticism by Prof. J. Laurence Laughlin, who is a well-known opponent of the quantity theory of money. His objections to Mr. Roberts's article, and to the editorial on the same general subject, which appeared in the next following issue of the Review, under the title "The Chief Cause of High Prices," are objections to that general theory, rather than to any special points in either of the articles upon which he comments. In attempting to meet these objections, therefore, it seems best in the first place to indicate, with such clearness as is possible in a brief space, what that theory says and what it does not say.

In its simplest form, the quantity theory of money asserts that, given the nature and extent of a country's industries, and the business methods and habits of its people, the value of money in that country—that is, the purchasing power of a unit of that money—varies inversely as its quantity; that an increase or diminution of the quantity of money in any proportion, unaccompanied by a change in the country's productivity or in its methods of doing business, involves a rise or fall of prices in the same proportion. In modern conditions an enormous share of all business transactions is effected not by the direct use of money—even if we include under that term not only basic money (gold, say), but also notes which circulate in its place—but through the operation of the vast system of banking and credit. Owing to that system, a given number of dollars in the country's circulating medium is capable of effecting a far greater volume of business transactions—as measured in dollars, not in commodities—than could be effected without it. Nevertheless, given the state of development of this mechanism of banking and credit, a country will require, upon a given scale of prices, a definite quantity of money with which to transact its business; and according to the quantity theory, if the quantity of money is increased or diminished, other things remaining unchanged, the general level of prices will correspondingly rise or fall.

Having thus—briefly and imperfectly, to be sure—stated what the theory does say, it will be well to point out some things that it does not say. It does not say that the volume of money is the only thing that affects the level of prices in a given country. Anything that increases productivity tends to lower prices, and anything that diminishes productivity tends to raise them. In so far, for instance, as productivity today is less than it was two years ago, or four years ago, that lessened productivity accounts for the rise of prices in that period; no quantity-theory man would deny that. When any one asserts—as does Professor Copeland in the remarks we quoted from him in the editorial above referred to—that “the inflation of our currency is unquestionably the greatest factor” in the causation of high prices, he does so because in his opinion there has been no such diminution of productivity as would account for more than a minor part of the rise, while in the volume of the circulation there has been an increase so great as to account for most of it.

Another thing that the quantity theory does not say is that when the volume of money is increased the rise of price of any particular commodity is caused simply by that increase. The mere existence of the money does not raise the price of the commodity; some specific demand for it must be brought into play. At all times there are fluctuations both in supply and in demand which tend to raise or to lower the price of any particular commodity; but when the volume of the monetary medium (including the resources of the banking and credit system) keeps pace, and no more than keeps pace, with the volume of production and business, the general level of prices does not rise or fall. When there is a great fall in the general level of prices—as in 1873-97—the monetary medium has grown less rapidly than production; when there is a great rise—as there has been for the past dozen years or more—the monetary medium has grown more rapidly than production. But whether the general level of prices be rising, or falling, or stationary, the price of each particular commodity is determined by causes affecting the supply and demand of that commodity as well as by the volume of the monetary medium. When the Bolshevik printing press makes a hundred rubles grow where one grew before, everybody sees that it will take a vastly greater number of rubles to buy anything than it did in the old days; but if you look at any particular thing you will find that the reason that thing fetches the number of rubles it does, is because there are people willing and able to pay that price in rubles for all of it that is forthcoming. But if the rubles had never been printed, all the willingness in the world would not have enabled them to pay it.

Now the essence of Professor Laughlin's criticism is to be found in his insistence that what caused the rise of prices all round was the raising of the price of one thing after another, not because there was more money to be had, but because the particular thing in question was in acute demand. Above all, so far as this country at least is concerned, he finds the raising of wages, i. e., the price of labor, to have been the prime cause of much of the general rise of prices that we have witnessed. Citing Mr. Roberts's reference to the fact that the Government set this process in motion on a great scale in order to attract labor to the war industries, he says that this is “an admission that wars directly against his general principle,” because here “a cause working on production-costs is admitted to have a direct effect in raising prices.” Unquestionably it has, but the “production-costs” here referred to are production-costs measured in dollars; and nobody denies that when more dollars are offered either for a commodity or for the necessary means of producing that commodity, the price of the commodity will be greater than before. It would be going only a step further than Professor Laughlin does, if one were to say that the real cause of the price of anything being raised is that more money is paid for it. No contradiction whatever of Mr. Roberts's general position is involved in the fact—if it be a fact—that the way in which the greater supply of dollars was brought to bear upon the price-level was chiefly through an advance of wages followed by an advance of prices of commodities, rather than the reverse, which Professor Laughlin says was the order of events in England.

The point is that in whatever way the rise of prices is initiated, it could not be maintained, and spread throughout the whole range of commodities and services, without something like a corresponding expansion of the medium of payments. In a normal state of the monetary medium, the limitations set by its aggregate amount tend to keep the general level of prices steady, in spite of possibly very great advances in the prices of particular commodities; but no such steadying force exists when that medium expands indefinitely to meet the necessities, real or supposed, of the situation. Whether it was wise or unwise to bring about the great expansion of the monetary medium which has taken place—indeed whether it was possible or impossible to do otherwise—the fact that the expansion has taken place affords, from the standpoint of the quantity theory, a sufficient explanation for the major part of the rise of prices that has occurred; and whether this explanation is correct or not, there is nothing in the facts to which Professor Laughlin refers—and which, as he says, are matters of common knowledge—that is in the least contradictory to the quantity-theory view.

The matter is of course enormously complicated by the consideration of foreign demand. So long as the chief nations with which we were dealing were strictly on the gold standard, and especially so long as we were receiving from them—as we did in the early years of the European war—great quantities of gold, this demand was perhaps the most important of all the influences bearing upon the rise of our level of prices. It is impossible here to do more than mention this point, and to make in connection with it two elementary remarks. One is that expansion of monetary medium has been taking place in those countries on an even greater scale than with us. The other is that under present conditions, with none of the great European nations keeping their currency redeemable in gold, the United States is substantially the sole repository of the gold standard. No one can say absolutely how large a volume of currency we can maintain in this country and still keep all of it redeemable in gold; but so long as that redeemability is maintained, the expansion of our monetary medium has the same kind of effect in depressing the value of gold—its general purchasing power—as would an addition to the stock of gold itself. In ordinary times such expansion would drive gold out of the country; at present it has but very little tendency to do so.

One source of confusion in dealing with the whole subject is the ambiguity of the word “inflation.” By some it is used in a general way to mean any kind of expansion of the circulating medium, by others it is confined to such expansion as endangers the parity of the currency with gold, and still others use it as covering something more than this last meaning, but not so much as the first. When Professor Laughlin refers to a big rise of prices before “inflation” appeared in this country, he evidently does not mean by “inflation” simply an increase in the monetary medium, for upon that point he would not need the assurance which he states that he received from “highly competent bankers.” The quantity theory of money is not an exhaustive explanation of all the phenomena of prices, but its fundamental correctness in accounting for the main facts of such a general rise of prices as we are now living through, or such a general fall of prices as came to an end twenty years ago, is not impugned by any of the considerations which Professor Laughlin has brought forward.

The Parlor Bolshevik

"Won't you walk into my parlor?
It's sweetly done in pink,
And there we'll talk and talk and talk,
And think we think we think."

MR. JOHN SPARGO, in the World's Work for December, makes an interesting effort to penetrate the psychology of the "parlor" Bolshevik. Under his analysis several types emerge, some of which we may briefly indicate as Victims of a Capital Obsession, Victims of Religious Hysteria, Earnest Supporters of any Worthy Cause, Intellectualized System-makers, Ascetics, both Christian and Secular, and Disappointed Idealists, together with Romantics, Furious Dissenters, and a vague fringe of those whose shattered nerves are merely in search of tonic excitement.

It will not do, however, to dismiss these people as mad; for one thing they quite naturally refuse to be dismissed. Any fruitful study of them must begin with the assumption that they are not so very different from the rest of us. Their like has always been with us. If they have defects they have also the qualities of those defects. They have greater warmth and range and energy of thought and expression than your smug citizen. On many topics they are better informed. They are more "alive," protesting against the tiniest evil, and promoting even the smallest good, with an intensity to which the "bourgeois" in no circumstances rises. They radiate an atmosphere of freedom, of large views, of fresh and final approaches. So, at least, they appear to themselves and to their young imitators. They have a glowing sense of belonging to the sort of people by whose virtue the world moves forward.

In a way they are right. Without these qualities it would be a sad world, indeed. The mistake comes in imagining that a vigorous exhibition of such virtues in a large and public way proves the possession of them in any really supereminent degree. The truth is that in the great mass of mankind there is to be found an abundant store of sympathy, of fair play, of a desire for personal and general betterment. Most people weave these threads into the varied patterns of their own lives. But inflamed with a "cause," dieted on a "grievance," cut off from its natural expression in living, even a feeble desire to love good and hate evil, to remove oppression and establish justice, may acquire a spasmodic energy so great as to persuade its possessor and some of his beholders that here is one who has come not to live life, but to mould it.

The world has had a share of those who were in sober truth moulders of life, though not many of them. But what made these men great was a sense of responsibility. Responsibility cast aside, it is not difficult to appear, or to be, clever; it is not hard to glimpse a perfection that contrasts with a world whose every flaw we have made ourselves painfully aware of; the plainest citizen can be a hero in a world of dreams unvaleted by facts. Anybody can take an intellectual night off in Utopia, and many do, returning with a recognition of their folly and refreshed dedication to their proper business.

There is much that is amusing about the parlor Bolshevik, much that is fair game for satire, but there is also a great deal that is lamentable. A deplorable waste and inefficiency is involved in the withdrawal from a normal relation to society of a large body of people who by their means, their intellectual equipment, and their sensitiveness to the good and the beautiful are precisely the ones whom society most needs. Their extravagant behavior brings all proposals for betterment under suspicion, and they thus do what in them lies to make reaction seem the only alternative to revolution. It might indeed be argued that in America they are the only serious menace. For nothing can be done with them directly; they can not be deported to the land of their dreams; they can not, while things proceed as they are going, be "Americanized" into a different mind. They represent a permanent and double loss, a loss of what should have been a gain.

The peculiar menace of the parlor Bolshevik resides in the fact that for the moment there is some sort of recognizable agreement between the world without and the world as they have fancied it within. For the first time there is something definite for them to get together on. For the first time they can say, "We are the people who recognize the facts, the great fact of impending proletarian revolution." Not till the Russian revolution got under way had anything so attractive in its completeness and concreteness come into their ken. Up to that time some of them had been highly useful members of the community, others had ardently and successively espoused each new cause as it arose, others were still too young or too vague to attain to anything resembling coherence. But old ideas given fresh expression in the Russian formula came upon them with stunning force. Never mind the facts—the idea behind the facts was better than any dream. "Dreamers forsooth! Behold what the dreamers are doing! Here is a world into which we too may step forth, humble the proud, brush aside the dishonest, the solemn, the routine, the sordid, the baffling, the irrational, the unjust, and start fresh. See now what a dreamer can do! Thinker, rather! A whirlwind which I can ride, a storm which I can direct, more powerful than I, but doing my will, since its will is mine."

The problem before America, of which the existence of such a thing as the parlor Bolshevik is a pressing reminder, is one simple to state though difficult enough to solve. It is to build up in society a "resistance" to those morbidities that have produced the parlor Bolshevik. There, if one is disposed to dream, is something worth dreaming about. Imagine a society in which not everybody, to be sure, is reasonable, but enough are reasonable to set a fashion for the rest; in which there is just as little excuse for private efforts to regulate other people's affairs as for private warfare or private judicature; in which everyone gets a fair chance to subdue for himself so much as he can of life's wilderness; a society in which individuals count for more than groups of individuals; a society, in short, in which an important rôle is played by some of the positive virtues possessed by these same parlor Bolsheviks, but controlled, as theirs are not, by a sense of responsibility for results. This is a dream beside which the revolution cheered on by the parlor Bolshevik looks like a mere phantasm born of class jealousy.

European Neutrals and the League

THE treaty fight in the Senate is followed with keen interest in the neutral countries of Europe. Before the United States went into the war, they looked upon this country as their spokesman and champion in cases where the right of neutrals had to be vindicated against arbitrary encroachment by the belligerents. America's abandonment of her neutrality, though it gave them hope of an ultimate removal of the German scare, threatened, for the duration of the war, to weaken still further their precarious position between the hostile powers. The Entente's gain of a powerful ally was a gain also to them insofar as the cause for which the Entente stood had the moral support of most neutral nations, but that gain involved a temporary loss of safety. Hence it was with mixed feelings that America's entrance into the conflict was commented upon by the organs of the neutral press, the event being hailed or lamented according to the writer's greater concern for the future peace of Europe or for the immediate safety of his own country.

A similar conflict of opinions is noticeable to-day in their appreciation of the Senate's treaty proceedings. Hardly anywhere, outside the Entente countries, has the Treaty received unqualified praise, and the coupling of the Covenant with the Treaty has been severely criticised, as it seemed to involve, in the event of their accession to the one, the implication of their approving the other. They lost faith in the sincerity of the Covenant because of many a perverse application of its tenets. Still, they would not hesitate to join the League of Nations if the United States, of whose disinterestedness there is no doubt, would safeguard the high purpose of the League by its own accession.

So the debate in the Senate is the subject of conflicting criticism in the neutral press, Mr. Lodge being praised by those whose disapproval of the Treaty is stronger than their faith in the efficacy of the Covenant, but finding slight favor with such as ardently believe in the latter, however misapplied its principles may appear to them in the Treaty of Peace. But of these two groups the second is undoubtedly the stronger. The majority of the neutral nations would deeply lament America's decision to remain outside the League. It would face them with the difficult question whether their accession, in such an event, would not impair rather than insure their future safety.

It is widely felt that under a League of Nations with the United States left out, the after-war Europe will for small peoples be a worse place to live in than when her peace was, however imperfectly, maintained by the much-abused balance of power. They would not regret the disturbance of that equilibrium if, in its stead, a strong League of Nations, with America among its members, were to maintain the new-won peace and the principles of international law. But a league controlled by France and Great Britain alone would not compensate for the loss of the balance of power. Britain's interests, it is declared, lie outside Europe; she will wash her hands of the Continent when the situation there has ceased to threaten her own safety. France will be left in full control of European affairs, and the small countries, freed from the fear of German imperialism, will live under the obsession of a revival of ambitions such as actuated the France of Louis XIV and Napoleon. There may be little foundation for these apprehensions, but, whether groundless or not, the fact is that they exist and are bound to play a part in the decision as to the attitude to be taken towards a league which does not include the United States. Significant of this state of mind is the interview, in the Amsterdam Telegraaf, with Mr. J. Limburg, the head of the Dutch delegation at the Brussels Conference of Promoters of the League of Nations. This strong advocate of the League admits that "the entrance of neutrals depends largely upon the attitude of America. If America does not join, the position of the neutrals will become difficult, though I do not contend that it would be impossible for them to join."

Es ist nicht Wahr

AMONG the winged words that took flight in the war few will, no doubt, survive it longer than the notorious dictum of the ninety-three: Es ist nicht wahr. When the charges it denied will be but vaguely remembered, the curt phrase in which the denial was couched will still be quoted as a jocose negative formula. It will throw a pleasant cover over the bareness of a straightforward "No," the surprise at hearing the German used by a non-German speaker giving an additional charm to the device.

An uglier blot on German honor than even the crimes which the manifesto of the ninety-three unblushingly denied was the publication of that document itself. "It is not true that Germany is responsible for the War, it is not true that we wantonly violated Belgium, it is not true that our soldiers attacked the life and property of Belgian subjects, it is not true that our soldiers acted brutally at Louvain." One hears the bang of the professorial fist on the desk at every fresh iteration of the statement. But they were giving voluntary evidence on occurrences of which none of them knew any facts. To believe implicitly in the integrity of their Government may to the unsophisticated crowd have seemed a patriotic duty, but the first duty of science is silence, unless it is sure of its facts. But these savants rushed in where they should have feared to tread, attempting to shout down truth with no better argument than the authority of their names. Never were names, honorably won, more dishonorably abused by their own bearers. And when they learned that what they had denounced as lies was the truth, they failed to do what a man of science should regard as his imperative duty—to make public confession of his error.

Wer die Wahrheit kennet und saget sie
nicht, Der ist fürwahr ein erbärmlicher Wicht, says the poet of a students' song which all these men must have sung in their younger days.

There were, indeed, a few who sought to relieve their scientific conscience in the privacy of a confessional. Professor Max Planck, of Berlin, writing, says the Handelsblad of Amsterdam, also in the name of Adolf Harnack, Walter Nernst, Wilhelm Waldeyer and Ulrich von Wilamowitz-Möllendorf, poured out his guilty heart in a letter to the Dutch Professor Lorentz of Leyden, disavowing most of the letter and the spirit of the manifesto. But for men thus publicly disgraced, a private admission of sin is no rehabilitation. Not until the world has read it, in black print, and signed by all the survivors of the ninety-three will it reconsider its verdict.

Fifteen have gone to the grave with their name unredeemed. And how the surviving seventy-eight now feel about their disloyalty to science we know, not from their spontaneous confession, but from an "enquête" undertaken by one of their colleagues who always condemned the war and their vindication of it—Dr. Hans Wehberg, the famous authority on international law. The results of his inquiry were published in the Berliner Tageblatt, and are worth recording as a precious document of twentieth-century German culture. Sixteen, including Siegfried Wagner, the son of Richard, the historian Eduard Meyer and the writer Paul Lenz, were unrepentant sinners. Twenty-three, neither daring to maintain nor to forswear what they signed, refused to reply. The remaining thirty-nine admitted that they could no longer vouch for all the assertions contained in the document. Some of them even confessed, what for a man of science is a still graver crime than to speak without knowledge of the facts, that they had signed the document without a knowledge of its contents. What a pitiable spectacle: the man of letters, the appointed champion of individualism, debased to the level of the gregarious crowd, joining in its irresponsible, inarticulate roar. Carl Hauptmann realized, too late, what obligations his better knowledge involved: "I feel with horror," he wrote, "my aberration from personal responsibility; and I am warned for life against the headlong rush of the herd which throughout the ages has fooled humanity."

In justice to German professors, it should be remembered that we have little information concerning the number of them who may have refused to sign the preposterous document; and it is a special pleasure to be informed that a protest against it was signed by the man whose name is associated with one of the most magnificent achievements in the history of scientific thought—Dr. Albert Einstein, a Swiss indeed by nationality and a Jew by blood, but an honored professor in the University of Berlin.

“Lest We Forget”

SINCE President Wilson signed the Peace Treaty with the League of Nations woven into it, the attitude of the Senate and the expression of public opinion in the United States have given rise to an amazement abroad which Americans have been at a loss to understand.

The proceedings in Washington, while the Peace Treaty was under discussion, were closely followed all over the world, and, in some aspect or other, caused disappointment to all, no matter which side of the various controversies the individual observer favored. That mistakes have been made on all sides can hardly be denied; and that reproaches and re-cremations have followed is quite natural. The Treaty of Peace, although now rejected, will very likely again be taken up for consideration at the present session of Congress, and it would therefore seem desirable to attempt to clear up some of the misconceptions which have arisen, while the facts can still be easily verified. In this manner it may be possible to prevent, at least in a small measure, continued misunderstanding among the peoples of the world.

The European nations seem grievously disappointed that this country did not closely follow the lead of its President. Even in our own country, some writers have intimated that our attitude in this respect has given cause for just resentment. The universal assumption in Europe that President Wilson voiced the opinion of America appears to have spread the belief that there had been fastened upon this country an obligation to live up to this misapprehension.

Nothing could be less warranted, nor less in accordance with the notion of great masses of the people of this country, as repeatedly expressed by their constitutional representatives and through the press. Whoever attempted to ascertain the sentiment of the country, must have quickly discovered a great lack of unanimity and a very decided opposition to the President's views. While during certain periods of the peace negotiations the censorship may have prevented the general public from keeping in immediate touch with all of the currents of thought, foreign statesmen have at all times had access to the daily expressions of public opinion, and should have given consideration to the peculiar provisions of our Constitution. No blame for their oversight can possibly attach to the people of our country. Americans would be highly negligent if they permitted any such misapprehension to gain currency, because it would obscure a perfectly clear situation.

sued an appeal to his countrymen in which he said:

. . . If you have approved of my leadership and wish me to continue to be your unembarrassed spokesman in affairs at home and abroad, I earnestly beg that you will express yourselves unmistakably to that effect by returning a Democratic majority to both the Senate and the House of Representatives . . . The return of a Republican majority to either House of Congress would, moreover, be interpretative on the other side of the water as a repudiation of my leadership. . . .

In November, the country answered this appeal by overturning the Democratic majority in both Houses of Congress. In the President's own language, this constituted a repudiation of his leadership. It was a clear notice to all the world that the country did not stand unitedly behind him in his negotiations for peace with Germany.

Some weeks thereafter, the President decided to go to Europe, to assist in the serious work of the Peace Conference. In addressing Congress on the subject, the President said:

. . . the conclusion that it was my paramount duty to go has been forced upon me by considerations which I hope will seem as conclusive to you as they have seemed to me. . . .

Did the considerations appear as conclusive to the country as they had seemed to the President? The New York Tribune said on December 2, 1918,

. . . the net result of President Wilson's "personally conducted" peace programme has been to shatter American unity. . . .

The great conflict of opinion and the lack of all unity is clearly shown by the extracts from leading publications which may be found in the Literary Digest of December 14, 1918. The case is in no way weakened by the fact that these are extracts from newspapers unfavorable to the President's programme; it is to them that the foreign observer should have looked for signs of friction. And they did, indeed, serve as a true index of the attitude which later clearly emerged as that of the Republican party.

Was there any change in the attitude of Congress and the press after the President returned from Europe with the Peace Treaty and the League of Nations in his pocket? Did anything occur to change the impression which careful observers of the feeling in this country should have gathered?

On the eve of his departure from France, on February 16, 1919, the President sent a message to every member of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate and to every member of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives, in which he said:

. . . Each article was passed only after the most careful examination by each member of the Committee. There is good and sufficient reason for the phraseology and substance of each article. I request that I may be permitted to go over with you, article by article, the constitution before this part of the work of the conference is made the subject of debate in Congress . . .

On February 24, 1919, after his arrival from France, the President delivered an address in Boston, in which he said:

. . . Any man who resists the present tides that run in the world will find himself thrown upon a shore so high and barren that it will seem as if he had been separated from his human kind forever. . . .

. . . Any man who thinks that America will take part in giving the world any such rebuff and disappointment as that does not know America. I invite him to test the sentiments of the nation. We set this up to make men free, and we did not confine our conception and purpose to America, and now we will make men free. If we did not do that, the fame of America would be gone, and all her powers would be dissipated. She then would have to keep her power for those narrow, selfish, provincial purposes which seem so dear to some minds that have no sweep beyond the nearest horizon. I should welcome no sweeter challenge than that. . . .

And on March 4, the President delivered an address in New York in which he said:

. . . and when that treaty comes back, gentlemen on this side will find the covenant not only in it, but so many threads of the treaty tied to the covenant that you can not dissect the covenant from the treaty without destroying the whole vital structure. . . .

Did the country join in the sentiments so clearly enunciated, or did a part of the people accept the challenge? The answer was promptly delivered. On March 4, Senator Lodge, on behalf of thirty-seven Senators, read in the Senate a resolution to the effect that

. . . it is the sense of the Senate that while it is their sincere desire that the nations of the world should unite to promote peace and general disarmament, the constitution of the League of Nations IN THE FORM NOW PROPOSED to the Peace Conference should not be accepted by the United States; and

. . . that the negotiations on the part of the United States should immediately be directed to the utmost expedition of the urgent business of negotiating peace terms with Germany satisfactory to the United States and the nations with whom the United States is associated in the war against the German Government, and that the proposal for a league of nations to insure the permanent peace of the world should then be taken up for careful and serious consideration.

In spite of the fact that the President, in a speech delivered in New York on March 4, said:

. . . The first thing that I am going to tell the people on the other side of the water is that an overwhelming majority of the American people is in favor of the League of Nations . . .

is it too much to say that this announcement by thirty-seven Senators of the United States was again clear notice to all the world that the country did not stand unitedly behind the President in his peace negotiations?

The debates in the Senate since that time have shown the greatest divergence of opinion. The suggestion that the people of this country have repudiated any binding agreement made in their behalf which other parties to the agreement had a right to rely upon is erroneous and mischievous. A lack of understanding of our form of government on the part of foreigners is regrettable, but not justly chargeable to us. The President is supreme as far as the negotiation and final disposal of treaties is concerned, but ratification by the Senate is essential to make them binding. While the words in our Constitution "with the advice and consent of the Senate" are now rarely construed to mean that the President is compelled to seek the advice of the Senate during his treaty negotiations, they would undoubtedly imply that in certain circumstances coöperation is necessary. This, President Wilson has consistently avoided. Yet the Peace Treaty with Germany, with the League of Nations superimposed or intertwined, is the most ambitious piece of work of its kind in which this country has ever participated.

The feeling of uneasiness regarding the President's aloofness in this matter, and the knowledge which gradually spread over wide circles that he did not even consult his associates on these very vital and decisive questions, gradually developed into resentment, which found expression, for instance, in an editorial in the New York Tribune on March 5, as follows:

. . . He refused to consult. He would not appoint members of the Senate as members of the Peace Commission. He would not say in any definite way what he wanted, making the impossible demand that whatever he saw fit to agree to must be accepted without debate or amendment.

This tactlessness, to use no stronger word, put the Senate in a suspicious mood. The Senate, quite as much as the President, has its duties under the Constitution, and as he would not consent to a serious invasion of his prerogatives, he ought to know that the Senate would not consent to abdicate. . . .

There is no need to carry detailed analysis further. The proceedings in the Senate since the President submitted the Treaty are clear in every one's memory. After that step had been taken, the Senators had a double duty to perform. They not only had to conclude whether, and in what form, the adoption of the Treaty seemed in their conscientious judgment desirable, but also had to guard against an overwhelming encroachment by the Executive upon the legislative branch of the Government. To what extent each Senator was moved either by one or the other of these considerations, it is impossible to say and purposeless to discuss. They did their duty as they saw it, and the country may well be grateful that they had the courage to live up to their convictions.

If the system were once approved in this country that the President, no matter what his legal rights, could inaugurate or consent to radical departures from well-known and long accepted policies, by his refusal to have the most thorough exchange of views with the leaders of the coördinate branch of the Government, then the latter would indeed have abdicated in favor of personal government and of a form of autocracy not wholly unlike the one which the war is supposed to have destroyed. There is no more time-honored maxim in American political history than this, that the American Government shall be "a government of laws and not of men."

What Makes High Prices?

Comment Evoked by Mr. Roberts's Article

Enthusiastic Approval

I WAS so impressed with the article of George E. Roberts on the "Menace of Inflation," which I read yesterday, that I sent for a number of copies of the Review in order to give them to friends interested in the subject.

I think that this article ought to have the widest possible circulation, as it is a clear exposition of the present situation, so simple in form as to be capable of being understood by any one having the slightest knowledge of the subject. I hope it will be published in pamphlet form.

Mr. Roberts might in truth say of his article what Dryden is supposed to have said of his "Alexander's Feast"—that it was the best ode that was ever written or that ever would be written; but then Mr. Roberts is too modest to claim this for his article.

FREDERICK STRAUSS

Points About Bank Credit

I HAVE your letter of November 22, asking my opinion on the views expressed by Mr. George E. Roberts in your issue of that date, in his article "The Financial Situation." I find myself in agreement with his view that diminishing gold production and increasing gold consumption should ultimately bring prices down, but I think he is overpessimistic about certain phases of the matter.

For one thing, there is an enormous difference between Civil War greenback issues and the present expansion of bank credit. Greenbacks were non-interest bearing, and were not, in fact, redeemable in gold. There was thus no automatic force to lead to their retirement. Our bank loans, on the other hand, are interest bearing. When the Government borrows on short-term Treasury certificates it does so in anticipation of taxes and funding loans which will retire the Treasury certificates. When business men borrow at the banks, they do so for commercial reasons and pay off their loans when they no longer need them, to reduce their interest charges. Moreover, we are on a gold basis and expansion is checked by diminishing gold reserves.

The decline of Government borrowing in the second half of 1919 has, it is true, not led to a decline in the volume of bank loans. Mr. Roberts ascribes this fact to speculation, holding that speculators have taken up the credit which the Government released.

There is, however, another great factor which has been responsible for the pressure on our money market, and which has prevented the decline of bank loans and deposits. I refer to our immense export balance of trade which has been growing so rapidly since the armistice. Somebody has had to pay for this. Down to June, the export balance was financed in a very considerable measure by long time credits granted by the United States Government to our European Allies. Our Government got these funds largely by borrowing from American banks on short-term Treasury certificates. Part of the exports, however, even during the first half of the year, went on "open account" and since June 1 virtually all of the exports have gone in this fashion. There is thus an enormous volume of short-term current unfunded debt due to the United States from Europe, and the foreign exchange rates have broken violently.

This debt is being carried in part by banks making loans to carry it; in part by American exporters accepting payment in foreign currencies which they have allowed to pile up in European banks. Also, American exporters have withheld their exchange from the market, allowing open accounts to run; also, American speculators and American business men engaging in speculation have purchased foreign exchange and still have it. All of these methods of meeting the situation tend to expand bank loans and to make a drain upon the money market.

The foreign situation, therefore, by creating a great demand for bank accommodations, has prevented the decline in bank credit expected. The foreign situation has, moreover, been the primary cause of the great speculation which we have seen. It has drained our markets of goods, has prevented a decline in commodity prices and even forced them higher—a fact which has led to the belief on the part of many that present prices are permanent. This belief has naturally led to speculation in commodities, stocks, and also in farm lands.

This abnormal export situation must speedily be corrected. It is impossible to keep the export balance going at anything like the present rate for very long. The ominous day-by-day breaks in the exchange rates are evidence enough on this point. When our exports and imports come into normal relation, and when we have goods destined for export thrown back upon our markets, we should see commodity prices decline, and the volume of bank loans and deposits contract.

I thank you for letting me see Mr. Roberts's article. I have very high regard for his opinions and am always interested in what he writes. In the case in hand, I am in full agreement with him that liquidation must come and that prices must come down.

GUY EMERSON

A Dissenting View

IN the very illuminating study on "The Financial Situation" by Mr. Roberts, in your issue of November 22, an account is given of the expansion of credit due to borrowing operations by our Government. This account is clear and convincing, except in his statement of the relations between inflations and prices. On this point every one, of course, should be ready to find out the truth; or at least to try to find it. In the belief that in this article, and in one on "The Chief Cause of High Prices," in your issue of November 29, not all, nor the most important, of the causes affecting prices have been presented, I am impelled to suggest that your readers, in the interest of truth, should have an opportunity to consider some other and very practical elements affecting high prices and the cost of living.

Mr. Roberts seems to be inconsistent in different parts of his study. Following the stereotyped formula of the theorists dating back to Hume and Ricardo, he says: "Prices are the result of the relation between the purchasing medium and the supply of commodities, and the volume of medium having been inflated without any corresponding increase in the volume of commodities, the price level naturally has risen." Here we have the error of supposing that demand is necessarily expressed by the monetary medium ("whatever its form, whether gold, circulating notes, or bank credits transferable by check," as stated in your article on "The Chief Cause of High Prices").

A medium of exchange is a means to an end, that is, to save the inconveniences of barter. It is not a cause in the price-fixing process; for it follows a preceding price-fixing. For instance, in the time of scarcity induced by the war, when the Government fixed the price of wheat, a carload of wheat at a station in Iowa was paid for by a medium in the form of a check to an amount exactly conforming to the number of bushels multiplied by the price per bushel already fixed upon. And, in general, the great mass of commercial discounts at our banks arise from notes or bills drawn on the movement of goods from dealer to buyer, the figures rising or falling with the preceding price-fixing of the goods. Indeed, all bankers recognize the well-known fact that the figures of our exports and imports, and the items in our bank accounts, are doubled merely because prices have been doubled. Moreover, the combined figures of our bank clearings can not be used as evidence to show a general increase of demand for goods, since these clearings arise from offsetting checks on deposits, due mainly to loans on the movements of goods. They show only the extent to which goods (expressed in terms of money) are exchanged conveniently against each other. They do not indicate a demand out of the blue for all goods, but only a result of a shifting of goods against each other by specific demand and supply. There is, therefore, much more to the fixing of prices than is implied in making demand synonymous with the amount of the medium of exchange. Nor is it correct to say that the price of anything is fixed directly by the quantity of the medium compared with the supply of goods; for this method of stating the matter pays no heed to forces affecting prices which are axiomatic to every practical business man.

Indeed, an admission that wars directly against his general principle as laid down above was made by Mr. Roberts in another part of his article, when he said: "It seemed to be necessary, in order to get labor for the war industries, to make wages attractive enough to draw men from other work, and when the other industries, in self-defense, also raised wages a competition was begun which lifted the whole level of costs." That is, a cause working on production-costs is admitted to have a direct effect on raising prices. This is obvious to every one. Even the politicians in Washington have been obliged to show that an ever-increasing rise of wages for the same or a less labor-effort must inevitably result in higher prices and a higher cost of living. The practical working of such a force was so clear that the President was compelled to protest, in the interest of the public, against any further increase of wages. Certainly as to the inevitable effect of the force on prices there can not be any question. It is not necessary to argue it.

If the operation of this element on the level of prices is so self-evident, where do we come out on the main question? Without doubt something else besides the quantity of the medium of exchange and the market supply of goods has an influence on the level of prices. And yet, in your issue of November 29, you say: "It is to the inflation of the monetary medium that Professor Copeland, like substantially every competent authority, chiefly ascribes the rise of prices." As one of the incompetents I beg to differ. It is not a question as to the number of authorities for or against a dogma, but whether it can stand up against logic and fact, even as to authority. However, one could mention the leading banking authorities as against the academic theorists on this question. But that is not to the purpose. A principle must explain ascertained facts, or be discarded. Price is the ratio of any article to gold (our present standard). How about the various forms affecting production-costs on the goods side of the price-ratio?

Of these the outlay for labor, for materials, and for taxes are the most in evidence. In my judgment they far outweigh any other causes at work in producing the high level of prices; and our public policy should be shaped accordingly. No one denies that speculation and abnormal credit can temporarily raise prices above competitive production-costs; but we are faced with conditions which began to show themselves before inflation appeared in this country. As practical business men, what do we know of our own experience as to the causes leading to higher prices? Mr. Roberts casually mentioned the cause which disposes of his own general theory. Long before we entered the war, long before our credit could have been unduly expanded (in a time when highly competent bankers personally assured me there was no inflation), industries engaged in making munitions of war for the Allies had contracts which enabled them to raise wages for their workers to a height that drew them from other employers. The makers of all other goods had to raise wages correspondingly. That is, in this country (contrary to the order of events in England) wages rose first and prices afterwards rose to meet this initial increase in production-costs. These are facts of common knowledge. By April, 1917, when we entered the war, wholesale prices had risen above the level of 1914 by at least 83 per cent. (see Federal Reserve Bulletin, June, 1918). Labor was scarce and high. Wages, even of unskilled labor, had risen incredibly.

But war conditions magnified the effect of high wages. Materials were not only raised in price by a higher range of wages, but coal, machinery, and all materials of manufacture became scarce, due to the European demand. Without question, long before the inflation of the medium could possibly have been brought in as a serious cause, production-costs had risen enormously. Would any one who followed the railway situation, the passage of the Adamson act, the increase of wages which added hundreds of millions to expenses, the prodigious rise in cost of operation and maintenance due to the rise in prices of materials, have ascribed the higher cost of transportation to the inflation of the medium? Did high prices of food, wheat, etc., wait on the rise in the quantity of the medium, when even price-fixing by the Government did not satisfy farmers? Men could hardly be bribed to remain on the farms when they could get five to eight dollars a day in the war factories. What regulated the price of cotton? Was it a scarcity of medium which put it to six cents in 1914, or the stoppage of the European and domestic demand? And what led later to its great rise in price? What caused the rise in the price of wool? A superabundance of the medium or a scarcity of shipping and supplies? How about the scarcity of sugar when the European supply was cut off? And so one might go on indefinitely, dealing with the known facts of each individual commodity. For out of the combined quotations of specific goods the general level of prices is computed. The causes affecting particular prices are those which determine the final result in the general level of prices.

The matter of high importance lies in the public policy adopted to "unscramble" the high cost of living and its entanglements. It certainly will do "incalculable mischief" to "follow false scents." The concentration of the attention on the speculative hoarding of necessities and on "profiteering" are not likely to produce much effect on high prices. They do give the politicians a satisfying element for convincing the public that they are "doing something," and that strikes should be put off until their measures for reducing the cost of living have had time to work. Clearly, as you say, these are false scents. But is it not true that the politicians are shy at hitting upon the one active, direct cause of high prices and high cost of living? That cause, apart from scarcity, is the higher wages paid for the same or less labor effort than in 1914. If we accept the appeal of humanity and refuse to lower wages while prices remain high, what is the remedy? The public will continue to suffer, unless the high wages are justified by a greater efficiency of labor, a larger number of units of coal, materials, and food for the present high scale of wages. And yet it is at this very juncture that organized labor seems to be insistent on shorter hours and less production. Inflation, therefore, does not seem to be a very practical solution for the high cost of living.

J. LAURENCE LAUGHLIN

A Neglected Pioneer

AT the tomb of Colonel James I paused and paid the reverent tribute of a tear. In reverie I traced again his troubled life and the circumstances of his tragic death. How soon forgotten by an ungrateful world, I reflected, is the social pioneer! Though the idea lives, the being who wrought and proclaimed it sleeps in an unregarded grave.

Such a pioneer was Col. Jesse James, once of the Mississippi hinterland. Misunderstood, criticized, even reviled during his lifetime by persons of influence and authority, persecution followed him even to the far recesses in which he sometimes sought refuge. The Federal Government, the States, the counties, and the municipalities pursued him with armed bands; they urged his capture by the offer of large monetary rewards, and finally they compassed his death. He was ahead of his time, and not until long after his martyrdom were his theories taken up and embodied in comprehensive schemes for social salvation.

Unquestionably he never clearly formulated his social philosophy. He was not, in the classic sense, a scholar; he was a man of action. His deeds, however, which throughout his life were rigidly consistent, reveal certain fundamental principles of belief. Chief among these are the following:

1. Futility of the ballot.
2. Direct action.
3. Group autonomy.
4. Individual initiative and self-employment.
5. Forcible expropriation of wealth.
6. Responsibility of society as a whole for any wrong or unpleasant action committed by any one of its members; and conversely, responsibility of each unit of society for the acts of society as a whole.

His scorn of the ballot was extreme. He did not even look to it, as did the militant suffragettes some time ago, as an ultimate good to be obtained by burning houses, smashing windows, and destroying other people's mail. In his judgment the ballot was slow, cumbrous, and inefficient. The war-cry of the I. W. W. and of the Syndicalists, "Strike at the ballot-box with an axe!" would have won his judicial approval. His judgment regarding the ballot fitted consistently with his judgment regarding democracy, which indeed anticipated, in a measure, the attitude of the I. W. W., the Syndicalists, the Bolsheviks, and their allies of the metropolitan coteries by many years. Less sophisticated than his modern disciples, he could hardly have expressed the formula in terms now current. Sovereignty is not for the mass, which is fickle and slow-witted and blind to its interests, but for the special few, gifted with the revolutionary vision, who know best what the mass needs. And yet, allowing for differences in environment and cultural development, the substantial agreement of his own with the modern view is readily discernible. He would warmly have sanctioned the purely political side of the Lenin-Trotsky régime, though he would have had to dissent emphatically from some of its socio-economic vagaries.

He rejected the collectivist ideal of social control. The group was his unit of social organization. He had much the same ideal as have the Syndicalists and the Communist-Anarchists; much the same as that professed by the Bolsheviks, but wholly violated by them through their rigorous and sweeping nationalism. The group must be autonomous; its components must determine all questions of work and recompense that come before it, uninfluenced by considerations of other groups or of society as a whole. These groups might, indeed, be federated, but only by free consent and for temporary occasions only.

His theory of recompense was only partly communistic. He divided the formula, "From each according to his ability (or his means), to each according to his needs." The first part he endorsed and rigidly carried into practice. The second part he seems to have rejected; among the immediate gleaners of wealth in his group there appears to have been usually an equal division of the product, regardless of real or imagined needs. Yet his philosophy was essentially pragmatic; and understanding the circumstances he could not have disapproved the Bolshevik amendment to the formula, "To each according to his usefulness to the régime."

Society, he held, though in some sense an organism, is but an aggregation of units; and the correction of its evils is to be accomplished by pressure upon both the individual and the organism. His views on the mutual responsibility of society and its components were emphatic and brooked no qualification. He held organized society responsible for the treatment visited upon him and his family by Federal soldiers. The harsh conduct of the Government in attempting to regulate his mode of industry was repeatedly answered by the seizure and rifling of the first express or mail car on the railroad nearest at hand. Banks, too, by reason of their quasi-public services, were always regarded by him as a legitimate object for expropriation. On the other hand, anticipating the I. W. W., he held to a strict accountability such individuals as seemed to him perniciously active in the support of the social system. Perhaps he carried this principle to an unreasonable extreme, for it is recorded of him that in a great number of cases he severely punished certain persons on the mere suspicion of their having known, or spoken to, other persons regarded by him as Government agents. It must be constantly borne in mind that he was not a reformer, but a revolutionist, and that he held, as his modern disciples hold, that a revolutionary act is its own justification.

It can not be said with certainty what views he would have held on the current question of sabotage. He believed in self-employment. The act of sabotage involves, as a prerequisite, the relation of wage-earner and capitalist. It is not likely that any one ever suggested to Colonel James the constant extension of the system of wage-employment, and the unusual and even abnormal mode of employment which he himself favored and followed. The probability is, however, that had the matter been explained to him, he would have given to the practice of sabotage his hearty endorsement. There is nothing in the practice vitally inconsistent with the principles known to have been held by him.

As has already been pointed out, Colonel James's philosophy was essentially pragmatic. This pragmatism, moreover, was one that prompted to self-action and not to counsel. With the vicarious pragmatism which satisfies itself by urging, through megaphone and typewriter, the propaganda of the deed to other men, he can not have been in strong intellectual accord. Still, he may have understood. What he would have said of some of the gentle sybarites who loudly proclaim his doctrines, but who hesitate at any overt act, can not be guessed; and yet it is probable that in his large charity and tolerance he would have divined the difficulties of these disciples and extended his sympathy.

It can not be said that outside of a limited circle, Colonel James employed any of his time in propaganda. Among his immediate followers he enforced his principles with stern rigor. Outside of this circle he forbore to proselytize. He recognized that there were, and would always be, thousands of men who, indisposed themselves to undergo discomfort, would yet eagerly espouse the work of persuading others to do what they dared not themselves do. He seems to have realized that even the most flaming revolutionist may become too preoccupied with chafing at the crumpled rose-leaves on his couch to take upon himself the burdens and risks of militancy on the field. He was therefore content to live according to his own principles and precepts and to trust to the slow progress of civilization for a wider acceptance of his beliefs.

How justified was his faith can now be seen in the many evidences of the world-wide extension of his theories. They appear, in one guise or another, in a score of professed "journals of opinion"; in more uniform guise, frankly revolutionary, in some ten score other journals; from a thousand forums they are fervently preached; in a thousand places they are assiduously practised. Perhaps no school accepts them in their entirety. But everywhere they increasingly permeate the thought and feeling of our time.

So the world moves. Current reputations fade into oblivion, and the maligned of one generation become the honored and revered of another. It is an obligation laid upon all of us to see that honor is given where honor is due; and in penning this account of the protagonist of certain current modes of thought and action I am but seeking to obtain for him the just recognition which his principles and his activities should long ago have received.

The Labor Question in Japan

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

It will sound as if Japan is still something like that Land of the Blessed, when I say that we have no labor movement yet in the western sense. The strikes for better wage, of which the war has produced plenty, are not part of a labor movement strongly backed by a philosophical insistence on lifting the laborers to an equality with the capitalists.

I think it is perhaps a piece of cynicism that the Western countries ask Japan to send a representative of her laborers to Washington, when no labor union is recognized by the Japanese Government. It was a piece of innocent farce that Dr. Iwasaburo Takano was afterwards elected to represent the Japanese laborers at Washington. But his conscience and wisdom made him resign in favor of a certain person, half capitalist and half laborer, the engineer-in-chief and also one of the directors of a shipbuilding company. Dr. Takano is a student of the labor question the world over and a professor in the Imperial University. He would have brought to the work great knowledge and great sympathy with the laborers. It is fairly clear that there is some distance between the point of view of the Government and the desires of the working class. Yet the working class in Japan, powerless and uneducated, was obliged to select their representative from among the unsympathetic students.

As a class, compactly amalgamated, Japanese laborers have no existence; it is only natural, therefore, that their strikes, from the lack of organization, always fail, or succeed half-way under the Government's kind-hearted interference or the employers' humanitarianism. There are many reasons for Japanese capitalists to keep up an old custom of treating workmen as members of the family of their employers; although it is doubtless beautiful as a custom, it is difficult to practise when factories become large and industries lose their personal character. I think that only a few capitalists in Japan understand how to use properly their sudden wealth. And when the laborers are given such wages as are barely enough to procure food and clothes, it would be natural for them to look upon an intermediary between capital and labor, if there is any, with indifferent thanks. As a practical question in Japan, it remains to be seen how the humanitarianism of the capitalists will work, and how the working class can check their own unrest. Yet it may not be altogether a dream that Japan alone may be the country where the Government and capitalists and laborers, all three of them, will become humanized.

Responsible Representatives on the League Council

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Isn't it possible to combine the excellent contributions made by Judge Rose and Mr. Ralston Hayden to the last number of the Review on the subjects of "Treaty Reservations" and "The Rights of the Senate," and conclude that our only choice is to have it emphatically understood that our representative on the League Council must keep in touch with and be guided by the Senate through the ready channel provided, viz: The President and the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations? In such an event there need arise no embarrassing divergence of action in the conduct of our affairs under the League.

The Treaty would have been ratified long ago had the President obeyed the mandate of last November's elections and governed his conduct of our foreign affairs in accordance with our Constitution, setting thereby a sadly needed example of coöperation.

Industrial Democracy

IN "professional" circles it is common to disparage salesmanship as a phase of commercialism—a specious art by which people are induced to buy what they do not want—and yet publicity, preaching, propaganda, and other forms of salesmanship are needed to overcome the natural inertia of mankind and to persuade them to mend their ways. In this sense clergymen, physicians, lawyers, statesmen, teachers, artists, writers, philanthropists, engineers, and all other "professional" people have something to sell, and while some decline to accept remuneration, they are usually glad to have their wares accepted and appreciated. Even the Gospel has to be sold, though without money and without price.

Mr. John Leitch, himself a sort of industrial engineer, makes no bones about this matter, but thinks it quite "professional" to sell the Square Deal—a commodity which people could have for nothing if only they saw its importance and knew how to use it. He sells the basic ideas of fair play between man and man, preaches the gospel of goodwill in business relations; and it must be confessed that these simple principles are much needed and that any man who should bring about the widespread use of them would do a great service to the business world. Mr. Leitch says that we do not secure in manufacturing—to say nothing of merchandising—more than 40 per cent. of our labor efficiency, and he attributes this great waste chiefly to the ill-will that pervades the industrial atmosphere. The mechanism of industry has attained a high degree of technical efficiency, and would be enormously productive but for this noxious by-product that poisons the men who run the machine and makes them want to injure and even destroy their very means of livelihood.

In their saner moments both employers and employees are glad to hear of a remedy for this condition, for they know that industrial relations are in a bad way, and that half measures and palliatives no longer serve. Welfare work and other expressions of benevolent feudalism are received with suspicion and ingratitude by the workers, who resent patronage and will not be made objects of charity. Besides, as Mr. Leitch says, a policy which abandons profit in order to give contentment to employees creates an eleemosynary institution and not a permanent, going concern, based on sound business principles. Efficiency engineering largely fails because of lack of coöperation on the part of the workers, who dislike speeding-up and excessive supervision, and do not wish to become what G. K. Chesterton calls "a race of healthy, docile work-horses." Piece rates are unpopular for similar reasons, and when cuts are made the average worker makes a game out of beating the rates. Profit-sharing, even, is only moderately successful, as the workers do not understand the complicated methods of computing profits, the dividend periods are too remote, and frequently there is little or no profit to divide. Indeed, profit-sharing, in the opinion of Mr. Leitch, is basically unsound, because the laborer is not a co-manager, and profits are not to be mixed with wages. Stock purchasing also is ineffective, as the employee can not buy enough to give him any considerable interest in the business. Nor does trade-unionism improve matters, for it cultivates ill-will, builds upon it, and seeks to divide employers and employees into hostile camps, working at cross purposes even when not in open conflict.

To this situation, which in some cases is almost intolerable, comes Mr. Leitch with a well-considered plan of industrial democracy, and when he is given a free hand he proceeds to put it in operation. First, he prepares the mind of the employees by a series of weekly mass-meetings in company time, at which he discourses on the four corner-stones of the golden rule—justice, coöperation, economy, and energy—with a final address on service, the capstone of all. Meanwhile, he does personal work among the members of the force, and when the time is ripe he launches his scheme of self-government, which is modeled after the Constitution of the United States, and is usually adopted with enthusiasm. The Cabinet consists of the executives of the business, with the president of the company as chairman. It is primarily an executive body, with the power of veto, which in practice is seldom, if ever, exercised. The Senate is made up of under-executives, department heads and sub-foremen, and has coördinate powers with the House of Representatives. The House is the popular body, elected by secret ballot, with a representative for each department of 20 to 40 employees. Meetings of the Senate and the House are held weekly and always in company time, but business is largely transacted through committees.

As to the powers of the legislative bodies, the author is not very clear, but he says that no definite limits to their jurisdiction should be fixed. Apparently, they are expected to concern themselves chiefly with the betterment of conditions within and without the plant, and the general well-being of the workers. For example, the employees of one company drew up a set of rules for their own guidance, dealing with such matters as hours and overtime, holidays, advancements, punctuality, care of materials and tools, diligence in work, grievances, use of washrooms, lockers and library—all showing a fine spirit of coöperation, with as much regard for the company's interests as their own. Questions of wages, also, come within the jurisdiction of the legislative bodies, and their help is of especial value in the fixing of scientific piece-rates. In every case the recommendations of the House and Senate have been approved by the Cabinet. Nor do the representatives always ask for higher rates, for in one case the reduction of a piece-rate from 42 cents to 11 cents was recommended because of certain labor-saving improvements, with the result that the workers earned more at the lower than at the higher rate.

An essential part of Mr. Leitch's plan, which has doubtless contributed much to its success, is the bi-weekly division between management and men of the "collective economy dividend"—a payment on top of wages which represents in money the interest in better work. This is determined by taking the cost of a unit of production in the period preceding the introduction of industrial democracy as compared with the cost after the plan has gone into effect. If there is a saving, one-half is the economy dividend, and is paid to the workers as an added percentage to wages at intervals not exceeding two weeks. Such a payment Mr. Leitch considers much more just than profit-sharing, on the ground that the compensation of workers should depend only upon factors under their control. Of course, many savings are due to the management, but Mr. Leitch has found that the majority of improvements are suggested by employees, and even where they are suggested by the management the hearty coöperation of the workers is needed to put them into operation. The question might arise as to how dividends should be calculated in a time of rising costs, but there is no insuperable difficulty here, as dividends may be based on relative savings in cost of production when, for instance, wages and materials have risen 50 per cent. over a former period, while production costs have risen only 30 per cent. It might also be objected that economies will soon reach their limit, but Mr. Leitch thinks that it will be a long time before this occurs, and if the day ever comes, some other plan for calculating dividends can be devised.

Mr. Leitch is most enthusiastic over the success of his plan, which has been introduced in more than a score of factories—including the Packard Piano Company, William Demuth & Company, on the railroad nearest at hand. Banks, too, by reason of their quasi-public services, were always regarded by him as a legitimate object for expropriation. On the other hand, anticipating the I. W. W., he held to a strict accountability such individuals as seemed to him perniciously active in the support of the social system. Perhaps he carried this principle to an unreasonable extreme, for it is recorded of him that in a great number of cases he severely punished certain persons on the mere suspicion of their having known, or spoken to, other persons regarded by him as Government agents. It must be constantly borne in mind that he was not a reformer, but a revolutionist, and that he held, as his modern disciples hold, that a revolutionary act is its own justification.

It can not be said with certainty what views he would have held on the current question of sabotage. He believed in self-employment. The act of sabotage involves, as a prerequisite, the relation of wage-earner and capitalist. It is not likely that any one ever suggested to Colonel James the constant extension of the system of wage-employment, and the unusual and even abnormal mode of employment which he himself favored and followed. The probability is, however, that had the matter been explained to him, he would have given to the practice of sabotage his hearty endorsement. There is nothing in the practice vitally inconsistent with the principles known to have been held by him.

As has already been pointed out, Colonel James's philosophy was essentially pragmatic. This pragmatism, moreover, was one that prompted to self-action and not to counsel. With the vicarious pragmatism which satisfies itself by urging, through megaphone and typewriter, the propaganda of the deed to other men, he can not have been in strong intellectual accord. Still, he may have understood. What he would have said of some of the gentle sybarites who loudly proclaim his doctrines, but who hesitate at any overt act, can not be guessed; and yet it is probable that in his large charity and tolerance he would have divined the difficulties of these disciples and extended his sympathy.

It can not be said that outside of a limited circle, Colonel James employed any of his time in propaganda. Among his immediate followers he enforced his principles with stern rigor. Outside of this circle he forbore to proselytize. He recognized that there were, and would always be, thousands of men who, indisposed themselves to undergo discomfort, would yet eagerly espouse the work of persuading others to do what they dared not themselves do. He seems to have realized that even the most flaming revolutionist may become too preoccupied with chafing at the crumpled rose-leaves on his couch to take upon himself the burdens and risks of militancy on the field. He was therefore content to live according to his own principles and precepts and to trust to the slow progress of civilization for a wider acceptance of his beliefs.

How justified was his faith can now be seen in the many evidences of the world-wide extension of his theories. They appear, in one guise or another, in a score of professed "journals of opinion"; in more uniform guise, frankly revolutionary, in some ten score other journals; from a thousand forums they are fervently preached; in a thousand places they are assiduously practised. Perhaps no school accepts them in their entirety. But everywhere they increasingly permeate the thought and feeling of our time.

So the world moves. Current reputations fade into oblivion, and the maligned of one generation become the honored and revered of another. It is an obligation laid upon all of us to see that honor is given where honor is due; and in penning this account of the protagonist of certain current modes of thought and action I am but seeking to obtain for him the just recognition which his principles and his activities should long ago have received.

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

It will sound as if Japan is still something like that Land of the Blessed, when I say that we have no labor movement yet in the western sense. The strikes for better wage, of which the war has produced plenty, are not part of a labor movement strongly backed by a philosophical insistence on lifting the laborers to an equality with the capitalists.

I think it is perhaps a piece of cynicism that the Western countries ask Japan to send a representative of her laborers to Washington, when no labor union is recognized by the Japanese Government. It was a piece of innocent farce that Dr. Iwasaburo Takano was afterwards elected to represent the Japanese laborers at Washington. But his conscience and wisdom made him resign in favor of a certain person, half capitalist and half laborer, the engineer-in-chief and also one of the directors of a shipbuilding company. Dr. Takano is a student of the labor question the world over and a professor in the Imperial University. He would have brought to the work great knowledge and great sympathy with the laborers. It is fairly clear that there is some distance between the point of view of the Government and the desires of the working class. Yet the working class in Japan, powerless and uneducated, was obliged to select their representative from among the unsympathetic students.

As a class, compactly amalgamated, Japanese laborers have no existence; it is only natural, therefore, that their strikes, from the lack of organization, always fail, or succeed half-way under the Government's kind-hearted interference or the employers' humanitarianism. There are many reasons for Japanese capitalists to keep up an old custom of treating workmen as members of the family of their employers; although it is doubtless beautiful as a custom, it is difficult to practise when factories become large and industries lose their personal character. I think that only a few capitalists in Japan understand how to use properly their sudden wealth. And when the laborers are given such wages as are barely enough to procure food and clothes, it would be natural for them to look upon an intermediary between capital and labor, if there is any, with indifferent thanks. As a practical question in Japan, it remains to be seen how the humanitarianism of the capitalists will work, and how the working class can check their own unrest. Yet it may not be altogether a dream that Japan alone may be the country where the Government and capitalists and laborers, all three of them, will become humanized.

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

Isn't it possible to combine the excellent contributions made by Judge Rose and Mr. Ralston Hayden to the last number of the Review on the subjects of "Treaty Reservations" and "The Rights of the Senate," and conclude that our only choice is to have it emphatically understood that our representative on the League Council must keep in touch with and be guided by the Senate through the ready channel provided, viz: The President and the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations? In such an event there need arise no embarrassing divergence of action in the conduct of our affairs under the League.

The Treaty would have been ratified long ago had the President obeyed the mandate of last November's elections and governed his conduct of our foreign affairs in accordance with our Constitution, setting thereby a sadly needed example of coöperation.

Industrial Democracy

IN "professional" circles it is common to disparage salesmanship as a phase of commercialism—a specious art by which people are induced to buy what they do not want—and yet publicity, preaching, propaganda, and other forms of salesmanship are needed to overcome the natural inertia of mankind and to persuade them to mend their ways. In this sense clergymen, physicians, lawyers, statesmen, teachers, artists, writers, philanthropists, engineers, and all other "professional" people have something to sell, and while some decline to accept remuneration, they are usually glad to have their wares accepted and appreciated. Even the Gospel has to be sold, though without money and without price.

Mr. John Leitch, himself a sort of industrial engineer, makes no bones about this matter, but thinks it quite "professional" to sell the Square Deal—a commodity which people could have for nothing if only they saw its importance and knew how to use it. He sells the basic ideas of fair play between man and man, preaches the gospel of goodwill in business relations; and it must be confessed that these simple principles are much needed and that any man who should bring about the widespread use of them would do a great service to the business world. Mr. Leitch says that we do not secure in manufacturing—to say nothing of merchandising—more than 40 per cent. of our labor efficiency, and he attributes this great waste chiefly to the ill-will that pervades the industrial atmosphere. The mechanism of industry has attained a high degree of technical efficiency, and would be enormously productive but for this noxious by-product that poisons the men who run the machine and makes them want to injure and even destroy their very means of livelihood.

In their saner moments both employers and employees are glad to hear of a remedy for this condition, for they know that industrial relations are in a bad way, and that half measures and palliatives no longer serve. Welfare work and other expressions of benevolent feudalism are received with suspicion and ingratitude by the workers, who resent patronage and will not be made objects of charity. Besides, as Mr. Leitch says, a policy which abandons profit in order to give contentment to employees creates an eleemosynary institution and not a permanent, going concern, based on sound business principles. Efficiency engineering largely fails because of lack of coöperation on the part of the workers, who dislike speeding-up and excessive supervision, and do not wish to become what G. K. Chesterton calls "a race of healthy, docile work-horses." Piece rates are unpopular for similar reasons, and when cuts are made the average worker makes a game out of beating the rates. Profit-sharing, even, is only moderately successful, as the workers do not understand the complicated methods of computing profits, the dividend periods are too remote, and frequently there is little or no profit to divide. Indeed, profit-sharing, in the opinion of Mr. Leitch, is basically unsound, because the laborer is not a co-manager, and profits are not to be mixed with wages. Stock purchasing also is ineffective, as the employee can not buy enough to give him any considerable interest in the business. Nor does trade-unionism improve matters, for it cultivates ill-will, builds upon it, and seeks to divide employers and employees into hostile camps, working at cross purposes even when not in open conflict.

To this situation, which in some cases is almost intolerable, comes Mr. Leitch with a well-considered plan of industrial democracy, and when he is given a free hand he proceeds to put it in operation. First, he prepares the mind of the employees by a series of weekly mass-meetings in company time, at which he discourses on the four corner-stones of the golden rule—justice, coöperation, economy, and energy—with a final address on service, the capstone of all. Meanwhile, he does personal work among the members of the force, and when the time is ripe he launches his scheme of self-government, which is modeled after the Constitution of the United States, and is usually adopted with enthusiasm. The Cabinet consists of the executives of the business, with the president of the company as chairman. It is primarily an executive body, with the power of veto, which in practice is seldom, if ever, exercised. The Senate is made up of under-executives, department heads and sub-foremen, and has coördinate powers with the House of Representatives. The House is the popular body, elected by secret ballot, with a representative for each department of 20 to 40 employees. Meetings of the Senate and the House are held weekly and always in company time, but business is largely transacted through committees.

As to the powers of the legislative bodies, the author is not very clear, but he says that no definite limits to their jurisdiction should be fixed. Apparently, they are expected to concern themselves chiefly with the betterment of conditions within and without the plant, and the general well-being of the workers. For example, the employees of one company drew up a set of rules for their own guidance, dealing with such matters as hours and overtime, holidays, advancements, punctuality, care of materials and tools, diligence in work, grievances, use of washrooms, lockers and library—all showing a fine spirit of coöperation, with as much regard for the company's interests as their own. Questions of wages, also, come within the jurisdiction of the legislative bodies, and their help is of especial value in the fixing of scientific piece-rates. In every case the recommendations of the House and Senate have been approved by the Cabinet. Nor do the representatives always ask for higher rates, for in one case the reduction of a piece-rate from 42 cents to 11 cents was recommended because of certain labor-saving improvements, with the result that the workers earned more at the lower than at the higher rate.

An essential part of Mr. Leitch's plan, which has doubtless contributed much to its success, is the bi-weekly division between management and men of the "collective economy dividend"—a payment on top of wages which represents in money the interest in better work. This is determined by taking the cost of a unit of production in the period preceding the introduction of industrial democracy as compared with the cost after the plan has gone into effect. If there is a saving, one-half is the economy dividend, and is paid to the workers as an added percentage to wages at intervals not exceeding two weeks. Such a payment Mr. Leitch considers much more just than profit-sharing, on the ground that the compensation of workers should depend only upon factors under their control. Of course, many savings are due to the management, but Mr. Leitch has found that the majority of improvements are suggested by employees, and even where they are suggested by the management the hearty coöperation of the workers is needed to put them into operation. The question might arise as to how dividends should be calculated in a time of rising costs, but there is no insuperable difficulty here, as dividends may be based on relative savings in cost of production when, for instance, wages and materials have risen 50 per cent. over a former period, while production costs have risen only 30 per cent. It might also be objected that economies will soon reach their limit, but Mr. Leitch thinks that it will be a long time before this occurs, and if the day ever comes, some other plan for calculating dividends can be devised.

Mr. Leitch is most enthusiastic over the success of his plan, which has been introduced in more than a score of factories—including the Packard Piano Company, William Demuth & Company, the Printz-Biederman Company, and Sidney Blumenthal & Company, of the Shelton Looms—and given up by only two. Everywhere there has been a gratifying decrease in the cost of production, a notable reduction in the labor turnover, a marked improvement in the morale of the force, and highly satisfactory dividends, ranging from 5 per cent. to 17½ per cent. of the bi-weekly pay checks. Among the other benefits may be mentioned immunity from strikes and other labor troubles, abolition of the petty tyranny of foremen, increase in wages, reduction of hours, increased production without speeding, improved quality of output, and elimination of soldiering through the social pressure of the workers themselves. In general, there seems to be a fine spirit among the employees, who have come to regard the factory and the interests of the employers in perfect harmony with their own. This spirit affects not only internal relations but the quality of the product and the reputation of the company. As Mr. Bond, president of the Packard Piano Company, puts it, "If there is no harmony in the factory, there will be none in the piano."

Of course, there is little that is new in all of this. Yet Mr. Leitch's plan of workers' representation seems to have antedated the British Whitley Councils, and he has made a contribution toward the solution of the labor problem by the particular combination which he has suggested and by making himself one of the chief prophets or evangelists of industrial democracy. In all conscience, both employers and employees need the gospel of the square deal, but how shall they hear without a preacher? Socialists, syndicalists, and anarchists have done their best to spread the doctrines of class hatred and social revolution, and it is high time that those who believe in the possibility of industrial harmony and good-will should have a propaganda of their own.

Perhaps Mr. Leitch is a trifle too optimistic about the experiments which he has inaugurated. The good results which he reports may have been due as much to the stimulus of the war as to the scheme of representative government and economy bonuses. Possibly, too, the bonuses may have to be reduced when competition reduces profits to the pre-war basis, especially in the case of the less prosperous or marginal firms. The author says that there has never been a strike under his system, but the recent experience of William Demuth & Company shows that strikes are possible in the best regulated businesses. Hitherto the workers have been satisfied with very limited powers, their House of Representatives being obviously subordinate to the Senate and the Cabinet, but the time may come when they will ask for more, and even interfere seriously with the management, as some of the Whitley Councils are said to have already done. These and other objections may occur to the reader of this most interesting and suggestive book, but the fact remains that bad feeling between employers and employees has markedly increased in recent years, and that if something is not done very soon to bring about a better understanding, there may be disintegration in the morale of the industrial army with far-reaching and disastrous results.

Notes on the New Girl

HELENA. By Mrs. Humphry Ward. New York: Dodd, Mead and Company.

THE GROUND-SWELL. By Mary Hallock Foote. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Company.

ALL contemporary fiction is more or less a note on her. As our own unique creature she holds the centre perhaps not of the action but certainly of the scene. Where'er she walks, men crowd into the shade. The spotlight gloats upon her, she adores herself, and there is no doubt that the young male, her playmate, accepts her delightedly. Whether she wears well as a spouse is a matter still to be tabulated, but the young fellows seem unafraid. . . . It is the old fellows, or perhaps rather the middle-aged fellows and their enslaved females who are afraid, or bored, or enraged, by this new protagonist of change. The enslaved females take the phenomenon more coolly, on the whole—whether as a fashion that has a right to its day, or as something inevitable and therefore acceptable, might perhaps be argued. Both views are represented in these two novels by well-known women writers of the older generation. The new girl has been edging into the foreground with Mrs. Ward for some time. Like many of her contemporaries, this observer has had it borne in upon her, slowly but firmly, that there is such a person as the new girl—a being actually existent outside the works of Mr. Wells and the plays of Mr. Shaw and the manifestoes of a noisy feminist minority. Some years have passed since the author of "Robert Elsmere" first yielded her heroine a cigarette, as a special privilege. Now that young person wears it (according to the novelists) as a matter of principle.

And so do her sisters and her cousins and her aunts; it is a point of breeding with the fastidious Buntingford of this story never to smoke in a woman's presence without offering her (as Pope might have called it) the frail nicotian lure. Other manners. . . .

And yet how far, with all her honest

effort, does Mrs. Ward really get away from her comfortable feminine Victorian heroine! Comfortable is not the word, since the Marcias and Lady Roses were always quivering on edge about something or other—uncomfortable variants from a comfortable type, let us say. Go to, she says, I know not gladly, but too well, what has been happening in the world since Victoria died. This new girl—I face her bravely, in all her outrageousness and all her charm. I see how these years of war have suddenly forced her growth, given her at once the freedom and power she has craved. But I do not and can not see that these things are of much use to her or, for that matter, are of too much real importance to her in her own deeper consciousness. Here is our Helena, beautiful, nineteen, with a year or two of ambulance-driving to her credit and a flock of advanced theories fitting about in her highly ornamental belfry. The war ends, her mother dies, leaving her in the hands of a middle-aged lord with a mysterious past and a hidden sorrow. Helena consents (at her mother's death-bed) that Buntingford shall be her guardian for two years, and prepares to be a handful in his hands. She must, she assures him, be free while living under his roof to follow her own code and receive her chosen companions. A tussle comes at once over the reception as her week-end guest of a notorious man about London (also a lord of the wicked kind). Buntingford wins, Helena expeditiously succumbs to his conquering generosity, and we seem well on the way to the revival of a very ancient performance. This, we believe, is really what Mrs. Ward would have liked to bring off. But she sees that it won't do. Just half way through, we get warning from the lips of the officially cynical Horne: "Isn't it one of the stock situations?—this situation of guardian and ward?—romantic situations, I mean?"

No—it won't do; middle age with a past may no longer fitly mate with glorious youth. Wherefore the mutual attraction of Buntingford and Helena is checked in time, and young Geoffrey French has the older man to thank for having turned the new girl into a fairly recognizable relative of the old one. Buntingford goes not unrewarded by his maker, being paired off with an old girl of his own generation. On the whole, the old girl "has it"; and for all Mrs. Ward's attempt to be impartial, she plainly enough sees the new girl only as a phenomenon or a phase which time will take care of very comfortably. Some years ago, if we remember rightly, Mrs. Deland expressed much the same view of her in "The Rising Tide"—where, however, she actually married the middle-aged guardian, or his equivalent.

Mrs. Foote takes her, one may say, but less to heart and more seriously. Her musing chronicle, "The Ground-Swell," is supposed to be written by a mother of brilliant mind and broad sympathies, wife of an American officer retired from active service early in 1914. The elderly, not yet aged pair have arrears of comfort and independence to make up, and set forth with zest upon the pursuit of happiness in a remote and carefully chosen corner of the Pacific coast. They camp, they plan to build the house of their dreams, and to be at home at last. But the mother's thoughts are much with her three grown daughters. Two are married, the first to a rich and dissolute Californian, the second to an average man with whom average happiness seems to be in store for her. What we hear of these two is not notably to their or our advantage. They are types endlessly harped upon in recent American fiction. And we do not see that Mrs. Foote's handling of the rich waster and his emotional wife is superior to that which, say, Kathleen Norris would give them. One episode drops to plumbless depths of melodrama. The book's value, apart from its merits of style, lies in its study of the third daughter, Katherine, the "new girl," who is so pathetically a changeling in her own household, and yet, for all we know, the legitimate daughter of these times. Her mother, like Helena's, looks with distrust and fear upon the revolutionary currents among which Katherine's bark exultantly dances. She wants her child for an everyday companion.

But being a daughter at home is not remotely within the plans of Katherine. She is full of the doctrines of freedom and self-expression and economic independence and the rest. She will "live her own life" in the thick of the biggest city she can find. In despair the mother tries to entangle her in love for a man, the romantic youth whom Providence has placed at hand, there on the Californian shore. In spite of herself Katherine takes the bait. It is her natural mating-time and she hears the call. But she is not a Helena. The spirit of the new-girl cult is in control. She has no notion of giving up herself, her work, to the dubious business of marriage. So it is as a "bachelor girl," laboring with a sort of violence among the poor of New York, and later as a nurse in France, flinging herself at death, that she lives out her brief span. "It is best to let things rest; but it grieves me to know there will never be wife or child for Tony": such is her mother's epitaph upon her. The honesty and ardor of the young creature, her Diana-like beauty and flaming egotism, are conveyed with uncommon vividness. Death snuffs her out unconquered by love. . . . The epitaph is a good one. And good is that glint of comment on the whole sex-defiant, or, if you will, marriage-defiant movement, the bachelor ménage wherein Katherine and her room-mate can think of no better names for each other than "husband" and "wife."

H. W. BOYNTON

Literary Paris

THE PARIS OF THE NOVELISTS. By Arthur Bartlett Maurice. New York: Doubleday, Page and Company.

THE FRANCE I KNOW. By Winifred Stephens. New York: E. P. Dutton and Company.

MISS STEPHENS and Mr. Maurice both know their Paris well. The latter says in his Introduction that "this book has been in my mind and in hand for many years. The writer first saw France as a boy of eight. He was there many times in the course of the impressionable 'teens. It was when he was in the early twenties that the literary associations began to take hold of him." Miss Stephens's book is more ambitious and she has not had Mr. Maurice's long preparation for her task—"this book tells among other things of seven visits to France in War-time," she says in the Foreword. Both have fallen under the irresistible charm of France and its capital, and though we may not always agree with some of their comments and conclusions, may discover a slip here and an omission there, these defects are rare and not serious and only slightly mar two books worth the reading even by old stagers of European travel.

Mr. Maurice has a chapter on Zola's Paris. He takes us to many of the haunts and lodgings of the "Father of Naturalism," but when he comes to the fatal night in 1902, all we are told is that "the sudden and tragic end came in an apartment of the Rue de Bruxelles." Here Mr. Maurice lost an opportunity to give us an interesting picture of the last home of Zola, in a rather pretentious old hôtel in a quarter full of residences of the Louis Philippe period. He might have described the little waiting room on the left of the big entrance door hung round with framed color prints; he might have said a word of the main staircase littered with old wood carvings and bric-a-brac, of the dining-room and billiard-room on the second floor cluttered with large pieces of antique furniture and showy porcelain, but with nothing very choice or artistic about them.

What Mr. Maurice says of Henri Barbusse and "the questionable but powerful 'Le Feu'" would have been strengthened if he had informed us that this one-time hard-pushed reporter of the Matin now lives on the top floor of a modern house in a new street in the rather uninteresting quarter behind the War School, and that when you get up to the top of the staircase and enter his cosy little flat you find there not only a tall, willowy man, cordial and sympathetic, but also a pretty, attractive blond wife, the daughter of that leonine-headed Catulle Mendès, the once-famous littérateur of the Boulevards. Mr. Maurice might have stated, too, that one of the first veterans to recognize this rising young writer was this same Catulle Mendès who praised in print a thin volume of poems, the only time that Barbusse has courted the Muses; and then, if he could have satisfied our curiosity as to whether this praise led up to the marriage or whether it was in consequence thereof, his two lines on the author of "Clarté" could have been expanded into two or three delightful and instructive pages.

Mr. Maurice tells how one day in the streets of Paris, Victor Hugo was pointed out to him riding on the top of one of the old two-horse omnibuses; but he says he always remains skeptical as to whether he had seen the real Victor Hugo. If it was on the impériale of one of the horse tramways of that time, it was most certainly the poet, for he preferred the tramway to the omnibus, and shared a very general habit of those days for seeing Paris for three sous from a high seat. One of Mr. Maurice's most unfortunate lost opportunities is also in connection with Victor Hugo, when he mentions the modest little house in which the poet spent the last years of his life and where he died. There were so many things to say of this spot! He could have told us of the side entrance through the other little hôtel which stood next to it on the south, on whose site rises to-day a towering maison de rapport. Here dwelt the deputy and ex-minister Edouard Lockroy, the stepfather of Victor Hugo's two grandchildren. And if you wished to get a peek, without any fuss and feathers, at the great man, M. Lockroy would take you in through the door which joined the two houses, where, in the little drawing-room, after lunch or dinner, you would find Victor Hugo standing up with his back to the mantelpiece, allowing himself to be courted, and now and then vouchsafing an Olympian utterance.

And think of Mr. Maurice mentioning Maeterlinck and never taking his readers into that quaint old residence in the Rue Raynouard, on the heights of Passy, where the sturdy peasant-like Belgian lived in and around 1900. This odd-looking hôtel, cut in two by a colonnade, with its sloping garden, its wide view over Grenelle, the Champ de Mars, and the hills beyond, would have been a fine subject for Mr. Maurice's pen.

And why, while presenting us to Tur-geniev did he not take us to the Viardot house in the Rue Pigalle, lead us up to the study on the second floor, where, back in the eighties, we should have found this superb Russian, superb in thought and stature; Berlioz, Alfred de Musset—both at one time habitués of the hôtel—these and so many other celebrities would have come upon the scene?

One of Miss Stephens' sins of omission is so flagrant and unjust to a noble Frenchman that we can not refrain from pointing it out. She says that Maurice Barrès, in 1915, in the Chamber of Deputies, was first to propose a national holiday in honor of Joan of Arc, whereas the real author of this movement was the late Senator Joseph Fabre, who brought up the question in the French Senate in the summer of 1894, after having agitated the subject many months before in the Chamber of Deputies. M. Fabre, who was one of the authorities in France on everything pertaining to the Maid of Orleans, called his proposed innovation "a patriotic fête," but M. Barrès and his friends have belittled the idea, and to-day this celebration on the second Sunday in May, the anniversary of the deliverance of Orleans, has really degenerated into an attack by ultra-catholicism on modern republicanism.

MRS. CLEMENT SCOTT has sprayed with ink some of the leading characters in Bohemian London—that tempered Bohemia which culminates in knighthoods and dines at the Savoy. Her subjects are usually, her facts sometimes, interesting; but her work, like other works of its class, makes one realize how little the memory holds, how little even the perception grasps, of recordable interest in interesting people. Mrs. Scott spares no pains to animate her subject. She writes a vivacious style, a girlish style, a style with crisp, crinkling paragraphs, and a frou-frou of exclamatory phrases. Expressions like "awful come-down" and "perfect scream" furnish proof enough that Bohemia does not truckle to Oxford. She can rise to seriousness, however: "The adamant hand of Death gripped him in his icy clutches." This would congeal any reader. In her dedication, which, though ungrammatical, is rather good, she complains that her friends do not understand her—a remissness for which every reader of her book will admit that her friends are inexcusable.

The little notes that Mrs. Scott has wisely saved often tell us more than the glancing, but shredded narrative. Here is one from Ellen Terry:

I send this, which wants no answer, to say I much hope you are not going away because you are really ill, and to wish you every good thing on your journey. Will you take me to Japan?!!! Oh! I want to go there! By Jingo! You'll be missed here. I may chance to see you before you start, but, if not, I pray God be with you, and God bless you.

Yours affectionately,

ELLEN TERRY

The mixture of fermentation, affection, piety, and swagger in this curvetting little note is human, feminine, histrionic, and Ellen-Terryish—the four things that a note from Ellen Terry ought to be.

There is a good deal, naturally, about the dramatic critic himself. The writer of this comment does not know a great deal about Clement Scott; he has always felt that Clement Scott was a person about whom he could wait to be informed. This book offers no basis for a final judgment; the tentative impression that it leaves is that Clement Scott was a Triton of the minnows, a dictator of the revels, taking his own work with a seriousness which he required everybody else to share. Mr. Bernard Shaw's undoubtedly sincere opinion that Clement Scott was sensitive to art in acting should be set down to the credit of the critic's insight and the author's liberality. It is curious that in the satire of Mr. Shaw's alleged portrait of Clement Scott in the "Philanderer," the man should be more likable than in the apotheosis to which he is exalted by his wife.

When Dr. Solf, Colonial Secretary under the Imperial Government, was in charge of the Foreign Office after the revolution, he allowed Dr. Johannes Lepsius to examine all the documents in the archives relating to the Armenian atrocities. The results of his investigation are contained in a volume of over 500 pages, entitled "Deutschland und Armenien, 1914-1918, Sammlung Diplomatischer Aktenstücke" (Potsdam: Tempelverlag). The author does not shrink from admitting the terrible extent to which the Turks have carried their wholesale massacre of a subject nation. He reckons that of the 1,845,450 Armenians living in Turkey before the war, about a million succumbed under the sufferings inflicted on them by persecution, murder, disease and starvation. Of the surviving 845,000 about 200,000 are left in their own homes. An equal number are scattered, 250,000 have fled to the Caucasus, and 200,000 are living or starving in concentration camps, where they have to pay for their shelter with the renunciation of their creed. Dr. Lepsius has the less reason for concealing or extenuating these facts as the documents which he prints bring convincing proof, as he believes, that the German Government was not guilty of complicity in this systematic extermination of a whole people. He has printed long notes and remonstrances addressed to the Sublime Porte by the German Ambassador, Freiherr von Wangenheim, and his successors, which were invariably answered with the excuse that the Armenian question was a purely internal affair, which should be exempt from interference by a foreign Government. Dr. Lepsius' clemency is all too readily extended to the Imperial ally of the Sultanate. It may be pleaded, in extenuation of the German Government's guilt, that it could not have substituted coercion for remonstrance without risking a breach of the alliance, but that very excuse implies the confession that Germany was willing to pay the Armenian blood-money for the continuance of Turkey's support. And, though officially, as these documents printed by Dr. Lepsius prove, the Germans have done their diplomatic best to stop the cruelties, they have individually been accomplices of the Turks by connivance and commission. Though Dr. Lepsius had been able to multiply his official material a hundredfold, the German Government would still stand condemned by the evidence of four German eyewitnesses of the massacres, all teachers at the "Deutsche Realschule" in Aleppo. That evidence is contained in a moving appeal addressed by them to the Foreign Office at Berlin, dated from Aleppo, October 8, 1915. One of them, Dr. Graeter, wrote: "The Germans, with rare and laudable exceptions, look passively on, excusing their inactivity by saying: 'We need the Turks.' I also know that an official of the German Bagdad Railway had orders from his superiors not to assist the Armenians, and that German officers brought complaints against the German Consul at Aleppo for showing sympathy with the wretches." And when the Armenians of Urfa refused to evacuate their town, "the German commander, Count Wolf von Wolfskehl, ordered the place to be bombarded, and a thousand male inhabitants who had surrendered themselves were shot at his command." This active coöperation with the murderers in a "purely internal Turkish question" shows to what limitations the argument for non-interference was subject.

Most persons believe that clouds get the bulk of the moisture for rainfall from the ocean. In reality they get more of it from the forests, which absorb and evaporate incredible quantities of water. "The largest steam boiler in use, kept constantly boiling, could not evaporate more water than one large elm would in the same time," says Inez N. McFee, the author of "The Tree Book" (Stokes). There she has brought together a number of facts which will

"The Financial Situation"

This article on THE MENACE OF INFLATION, written by George E. Roberts of The National City Bank, formerly Director of the Mint, appeared in THE REVIEW November 22, 1919. Frederick Strauss, of J. & W. Seligman & Co., New York, says of it:

"I think that this article ought to have the widest possible circulation as it is a clear exposition of the present situation, so simple in form as to be capable of being understood by anyone having the slightest knowledge of the subject."

10 copies or less, free on request. Larger quantities at cost.

"The Creed"

A well-known educational institution recently sent out 5,000 copies of a folder in which it reprinted "THE CREED" of THE REVIEW. This creed has now been reprinted on cards of postcard size.

Up to 500 free on request. Larger quantities at cost.

make the reader regard with greater interest the largest forms of vegetation which seem, like the elephant and the hippopotamus, survivals of ages when it was fashionable to be gigantic. Fruit trees are not included in the author's scheme, but she has chapters on oaks, maples, elms, willows and poplars, beeches, walnuts, and a number of other tree families, whose life stories are told in simple style, for both children and adults.

'L'Italiana in Algeri'

WHEN, in the Metropolitan prospectus a few weeks ago, Mr. Gatti-Casazza, the director of that house, announced "L'Italiana in Algeri," a few, if not most, opera-goers smiled and scoffed. I confess that I was one of them.

"Why," they commented, "should so archaic an example of opera-buffa be unearthed at this late day, when modern operas, of much greater fame, shrieked for production at the Metropolitan?" And they were right enough, at least in theory, in preferring modern operas to opera-buffa.

But, after hearing (and, above all, after seeing) this particular work, like many, I felt grateful, not incensed. There is no harm in this "L'Italiana in Algeri." Indeed there is a great deal to admire in it—a sprightliness of style, a melodic grace, a touch of sentiment and humor of a brand which, though now ancient, still has power to make us smile and even laugh. Apart from its own worth, which is quite real, it has historic interest. Rossini wrote it at the early age of twenty. And, though in places it showed Mozart's gracious influence, it had enough merit of its own to be almost a miracle.

The story which it tells is an invention of the librettist, Angelo Anelli, who did not care how much he strained plausibilities to devise a comic scene or situation. The heroine, Isabella, has been shipwrecked on the Algerian coast. There, with her middle-aged and unwelcome suitor, Taddeo, she is captured by a pirate, known as Haly. He has been ordered by Mustafa, Bey of Algiers (or some province in the neighborhood), to bring him an Italian for his harem. The former favorite of the Bey, Elvira, appears to have palled on him and he has commanded her to wed his slave, Lindoro.

Mustafa, though a tyrant, has good points. He has an eye for beauty and a pretty wit, which Taddeo fails to see when the Bey threatens him with impalement for disturbing him with the heroine. In Lindoro, Isabella finds a lover whom she had lost and mourned in Italy as dead. From that moment she sets all her wit to work to beguile the Bey into releasing his three captives.

The way in which at last she gains her end need not be told. It has the guileless imbecility which marks most opera-buffa. The Italian wife at last persuades her heathen master to allow her to return to her own land with Taddeo and Lindoro, while Mustafa, slightly fuddled, soon consoles himself with his despised Elvira.

The plot allows the singers opportunities for quips and cranks, for grotesque invention and at times for serious love-making. Except at moments, in the long recitatives, with piano accompaniments, the music, though old-fashioned, seldom tires. The orchestration here and there is less perfunctory than one might have feared it would be. One passage (for French horn) is Weberesque. And the finales at two points are quite inspiring.

A ballet, introduced in the third act, will charm the uncritical, although it may distress some by the antics which pass muster at the Metropolitan as examples of African dances. For the musical there is the much talked of Rossini "crescendo," which the composer had already used in his first opera, "Tancredi." It is worth noting that in "L'Italiana," as in other works, Rossini made his heroine a contralto. For at the beginning of the nineteenth century, as we have read, the high solo parts in some Italian operas were still sung by male sopranos.

"L'Italiana" should do very well indeed here, for a season or two. It gives rare chances for the florid style of singing which was once so popular. And, of the artists in the cast, a few are equal—or at least not quite unequal—to the calls upon them. If less successful in this frivolous kind of work than in the sustained dramatic music of "Aida," Gabriella Besanzoni (Isabella) has ease and vivacity, marred now and then by a slight lack of the distinction one expects in the chief characters of even opera-buffa. Adamo Didur, as Mustafa, has the grotesquerie permitted by the part. His Bey has been inspired by Bolm's exhilarating Czar in "Le Coq d'Or." The Lindoro of the young American tenor, Francis Hackett, has much grace; and, as Taddeo, de Luca again proves himself an accomplished baritone. Rosina Galli, no doubt, does the very best she can with the absurdities of her "Algerian" dances.

But the most admirable features of this revival of the old Rossini opera have been contributed by the scene-painters and costumers of the Metropolitan. The Mauresque interiors, some of which are really beautiful, delight the eye; while the picture of the shipwreck charms by its strangeness and its brave barbaric color. The costumes, on the other hand, enchant one by their artistic vividness. The blues and grey blues of one group of dances, more especially, are exquisite. And in arranging certain tones of rose and saffron, worn by the Bey's eunuchs, the costumers and designers of the opera house have shown rare taste.

There is nothing in Rossini's score to worry the skilled Metropolitan orchestra; and the conductor, Mr. Papi, was quite easy in his direction of the musicians.

To what mocking critics have denounced as "date hounds," it may seem worth mention that "L'Italiana in Algeri" was produced at the Venetian Fenice in 1813. It was performed for the first time here at the old Richmond Hill Theatre, in 1832, and revived in 1844 at what was known as Palmo's Opera House. The last revival of this pleasing work took place at the Academy, sixty-one years ago. Since then "L'Italiana" had been very comfortably laid away in lavender.

Books and the News American Books of 1919

THE question was: Will you name about fifty representative American books of 1919, or books published approximately within the past twelve-month? The answer, as I give it, names a few less than fifty, in order not to repeat juvenile books and gift-books previously mentioned here. This list should be useful in selecting gifts, but it consists of books chosen primarily for their contents rather than as fine editions.

In biography: "The Education of Henry Adams" (Houghton), which antedates 1919 slightly; W. R. Thayer's "Theodore Roosevelt" (Houghton); Seitz's "Life of Artemus Ward" (Harper); Ellsworth's "A Golden Age of Authors" (Houghton); Admiral Fiske's "From Midshipman to Rear Admiral" (Century); Beveridge's "Life of John Marshall," Vols. 3-4 (Houghton).

It has not been a good year in American fiction. Among the best books are: Hergesheimer's "Java Head" (Knopf); Alice Brown's "The Black Drop" (Macmillan); Mary Watts's "From Father to Son" (Macmillan); Tarkington's "Ramsey Milholland" (Doubleday); Black's "The Great Desire" (Harper); Zane Grey's "The Desert of Wheat" (Harper), and Van Loan's "Taking the Count" (Doran).

For the stage, and dramatic criticism: Mayorga's "Representative One-Act Plays by American Authors" (Little); Belasco's "The Theatre Through Its Stage Door" (Harper); Brander Matthews's "Principles of Play Making" (Scribner); Nathan's "Comedians All" (Knopf), and Baker's "Dramatic Technique" (Houghton).

Four volumes of poetry and its criticism: "Starved Rock" (Macmillan), by Masters; "Pictures of the Floating World" (Macmillan), by Amy Lowell; "The New Era in American Poetry" (Holt), by Untermeyer and "New Voices" (Macmillan), by Marguerite Wilkinson.

In art and architecture: Van Dyke's "American Painting and Its Tradition" (Scribner), and "Architectural Styles for Country Houses" (McBride), by H.

H. Saylor. In history and politics are some important titles: Rhodes's "History of the United States From Hayes to McKinley" (Macmillan); Charles Edward Russell's "Bolshevism and the United States" (Bobbs); Glenn Frank's "Politics and Industry" (Century); Professor Sloane's "Powers and Aims of Western Democracy" (Scribner); Edward A. Ross's "What Is America?" (Century); John Spargo's "Bolshevism" (Harper), and Judge Grant's "Law and the Family" (Scribner). Our part in the war is described in Brand Whitlock's "Belgium" (Appleton); Frederick Palmer's "Our Greatest Battle"

(Dodd); Powell's "The Army Behind the Army" (Scribner); Simonds's "History of the World War," Vol. 4 (Doubleday), and Woolcott's "The Command is Forward!" (Century).

Essays and miscellany include: Charles S. Brooks's "Chimney Pot Papers" (Yale Press); "Mr. Dooley on Making a Will" (Scribner); E. W. Howe's "Ventures in Common Sense" (Knopf); Dreiser's "Twelve Men" (Boni); Mencken's "The American Language" (Knopf); W. L. Phelps's "Reading the Bible" (Macmillan), and William Beebe's "Jungle Peace" (Holt).

[SECOND EDITION]

THE STEEL STRIKE

A special reconstruction number of the Survey which

into a situation in which there is much heat.

It is based on first-hand field reports—a piece of journalistic research comparable to the work of Ida M. Tarbell, Lincoln Steffens, Ray Stannard Baker in the early days of McClure.

It is easy to damn Gary or Frick, Foster or Fitzpatrick; but to cut through the husk of distortion and propaganda to the truth of a complex situation is not so easy.

It is easy to please either section in a great industrial dispute, by arguing on the side of their prejudices; but to get recognition as sure-footed witnesses and contributors from straight-seeing men on both sides of the industrial cleavage is not so easy.

Says a mill-town minister of the steel strike number of The Survey:

"I can't properly express my appreciation of this number of the Survey. It is the first responsible and impartial report on steel strike conditions that has reached me."

Says an official of one of the steel companies:

"That number is a wonder. Congratulations."

Says a strike leader:

"Compared with their clear and concise summary of the situation and the causes producing it, the report of the Senate Investigating Committee is altogether contemptible. Thank you for the fair hearing your publication has given our strike."

From the president of a national trade union affected by the strike:

"They are the fairest and most comprehensive articles that have as yet appeared in print, at least, coming under my observation and I have endeavored to read as much published matter as possible in order to get all sides of the contention and strike.

"It is such fair and unbiased articles that will help to bring about democracy in industry thus perpetuating political democracy in our country and save and maintain our present institutions."

In 1907 and 1908 The Survey carried out the Pittsburgh Survey; an interpretation of life and labor in the steel district. The findings were later published in six volumes. The Survey applied the same technique in an appraisal of the facts in the present strike; members of the staff visited Pittsburgh, Gary, Youngstown, Steubenville, Cleveland, Newcastle, McKeesport, Duquesne, Homestead and the other towns which figure in the date lines of the press dispatches. They interviewed mill officials, strike leaders, county and borough public officials. The first drafts of the articles were submitted for criticism in advance to the parties concerned, data was again checked up at sources and the articles stand a graphic, dependable record of an intensely human situation, the essential facts of which should be known to every intelligent American.

CAN anyone point to a word or act of President Wilson's from November 11, 1918, to the present day, that was designed to gain the good will of the members of the majority party in that body whose consent is necessary for the ratification of treaties?

WE ask this question not with a view to fixing upon the President the blame for the present deadlock. As has been well said, there is blame enough to go round. The one thing for which the Review is anxious, and which all along it has done its little best to promote, is that all sides should get together in a reasonable spirit and effect speedily as good a settlement as is obtainable. But there are at the present moment two things which bring acutely to the front this particular aspect of the treaty story. Dispatches from France have brought expression after expression of the feeling there that America has failed to live up to what Europe had every right to expect. Thus Monsieur Lausanne, editor of Le Matin, says:

The man who landed upon our shores a year ago, escorted by a great fleet of battle-ships and accompanied by a sumptuous staff of Generals and experts, was the President, elected and in full power, of the United States. We could not consider him as other than the representative of the American people. And when outside of the mysterious chamber where he closeted himself with his two partners to shape the fate of the world the President of the United States spoke to us, we were bound by all the laws of international decency to listen to his advice and to take account of it. We have not the right, we French, to interpret your elections, to shape your affairs nor to arbitrate between your political parties.

Now it may be urged, and perhaps justly urged, in behalf of Mr. Wilson's course, that it was only by representing himself as the unchallenged spokesman of his country that he could hope to play an effective part in the shaping of the terms of peace and of the character of the Covenant. But if it was necessary for him to assume that rôle in his dealings with the representatives of foreign Powers, the assumption clearly carried with it the correlative duty of making sure by every means within his power that the expectations which he thus inevitably aroused would not be disappointed. Whether the French knew it or not, he himself knew that without the assent of the Senate he could do nothing, and that that assent was not to be counted upon as a matter of course. Yet it would be difficult to name a single movement on his part—whether in the choice of his associates, in the announcements of his purposes, or in his relations with the members of what had become the majority party in the country—that was calculated to secure that cooperation upon which the fulfillment of the great engagement that he had taken upon himself necessarily depended.

THE other thing that compels attention to this phase of Mr. Wilson's relation to the treaty is the authoritative statement given out from the White House in which it is declared that the President intends "that the Republican leaders of the Senate shall continue to bear the undivided responsibility for the fate of the treaty, and the present condition of the world in consequence of that fate." This may be merely a strategic move; but it is bad strategy, and the sooner it is abandoned the better. The primary responsibility for the fate of the treaty is upon the President himself. It would be so even if his endeavors to promote its acceptance had been of ideal excellence. It is doubly so in view of his having failed to take those measures which the accepted rules of human intercourse prescribe as necessary for responsible statesmen. Plenty of blame rests upon others, it is true; but his own share, so far from being removed, is immeasurably emphasized by the adoption, at this crucial stage of the country's need and the world's, of an attitude of defiant aloofness. It was not necessary for him to make any public statement; if he did make one, it should have been directed towards the promotion of friendliness, not hostility. Fortunately, the hope is not precluded of a movement on the part of the Democratic Senators to bring about a settlement which, though not instigated by the President, may command his approval. His words do not explicitly shut out such a conclusion. But if he means more than he says, if he really stands in the way of the only possible solution of the difficulty, let him not imagine that there will be any possible escape from the awful responsibility for failure which his mistaken self-confidence will have concentrated upon him.

AMERICANISM is a good thing, but not everything is good that is said or done in its name. Silly and mischievous are the adjectives that come most readily to hand when one reads of the pledge that it is proposed to require the children in the public schools of New York City to take as a protection against revolution. "I will actively oppose all revolutionary movements such as Bolshevism, anarchism, I. W. W.-ism, or any movement antagonistic to the laws of the United States, or tending to subvert the Constitution of the United States." A child whose parents are good Americans does not need to take the pledge, and a child whose parents are the other way will, in nine cases out of ten, be a liar and a hypocrite if he takes it—supposing, of course, that he understand what it means at all. We know of no better way to make patriotism odious than to force this sort of pill down the throats of little children.

IT is much to be hoped that Princeton's campaign for funds, which opens this week, will take no harm from the announcement, first, that Mr. Frick had bequeathed fifteen millions to the University and, later, that this splendid gift would be very considerably reduced through the operation of the tax laws. Just how much will eventually come to Princeton does not yet appear. The best thing she can do is to leave wholly out of consideration for the present Mr. Frick's nobly generous intention, go out for the whole sum that she may need in order to continue her usefulness, and get it. She deserves it.

SOMETHING of that spirit which, until the treaty tangle got us all to quarreling, most Americans hoped would emerge directly after the war is to animate the exposition next week at the Grand Central Palace in this city. There, beginning Monday, the Community Recreation Associates, in coöperation with 146 public-spirited organizations, will point the way, by a great diversity of exhibits and activities, to the realization of a neighborly feeling towards our fellowmen and to the possibility of revivifying American life in accordance with its sound traditions. The common sacrifices of the war and the fine spirit of coöperation which they generated make the task seem not impossible of perpetuating beyond its special season at least a modicum of the Christmas cheer. At this exposition, as at the Armory of the Seventy-first Regiment under the auspices of the Liberty Chorus, there will be entertainments for thousands of children of poor families, with professional clowns to caper in their midst; and, in more sober ways, young, aspiring America will see manifold outlets leading to good citizenship.

One of the most important features at the Grand Central Palace will be the American Central Committee for Russian Relief. With such persons in charge as Charles W. Eliot, Elihu Root, Princess Cantacuzene, Mrs. Rockhill, and Mrs. McAllister Smith, one may be certain that the relief contemplated is sober and solid. The multiplicity of demands upon our sympathies should not blind us to the fact that by helping Russia now, under wise direction, we may be shaping the course of events in a momentous degree.

IT was to be expected that there should be some falling off in the country's response to the Red Cross Roll Call, which, it was planned, should come to an end on Armistice Day, but which in many localities has been continued until Christmas. The Red Cross, in a process of transition from a war basis to a peace basis, was scarcely able to make its most effective appeal to a country which was inclined to excuse its very natural lassitude on the ground that the war was over. The falling off, however, which may prove to be very small indeed, will still leave the Red Cross, with upwards of twenty million members, an organization of tremendous power, and as it gets into the full stride of its peace work more and more may be expected to respond to its appeal for universal membership, such an appeal as no other organization would dare to make. The Red Cross is faced with the problem of making good in time of peace, as it triumphantly made good in the war, not merely by speedy response to great and sudden calamity, but by steady constructive work in upbuilding the health and well-being of the community. With its tradition and its experience behind it there can be no doubt of the issue.

MR. HOWELLS is entitled to a full share of the fun that arises from a blunder in the circulation department—or was it clever publicity?—which sent to his address a circular offering to teach the art of the short story in forty lessons. They are amusing, these modern sophists who will teach anything for a price, and no money down at that. It would be pathetic if they were merely exploiting the human desire to be wise, to be beautiful, to be skilled in the arts, to receive greetings in the market place. Such desires are honorable to their possessors, and it is a pity to have them destroyed. But the lure held out, the lure which brings in the business, is the cash value that will accrue to the possessor of all these teachable commodities. On this basis a large part of the people is apparently willing to be fooled a large part of the time, and hardly deserves much sympathy.

UNDER the pressure of economic needs in Germany, the right of self-determination is in danger of being perverted by the voters into a means of escaping from their duty as taxpayers. The Danish Government is faced by the difficult problem how to prevent the creation of a German irredenta on the country's southern frontier. This is a queer world. Germany began the war, her rulers professed, to safeguard German soil against foreign aggression, and now that the war is lost that German soil is not too precious to be bartered for a lighter income tax.

TO the dead who have not died in vain, Maurice Maeterlinck has dedicated some beautiful pages in his latest book, "Les Sentiers dans la Montagne." "Far from being a loss, those dead are our treasures, because they reveal and adorn the national conscience, and because, in order to attain to them, to equal them, we must rise, we must lift ourselves without ceasing. There are dead whom the living could not replace, and the thought of whom achieves things which their bodies could not accomplish. There are dead whose elan overcomes death and recovers life; and nearly all of us are at this hour the mandatories of a being more great and noble and grave and wise and living than we."

IF to the making of books there is no end, there seem to be very definite limits to the public's willingness to buy books. These limits are set less by considerations of quantity than by considerations of season. Most people, apparently, buy books in December. Does that mean that they buy them only to give them away? A dangerous practice in these days, when every man as never before needs brains and the wisdom born of experience. Books are distilled brains; books are condensed experience; books are not merely pretty gifts, they are the necessary equipment of the big game we all have to sit in, willy-nilly. Or is it at this season that people make literary provision for a sort of desert isle betwixt Christmas and summer? This, too, is a practice not unattended with danger. Events move with greater rapidity than before, and books as never before keep pace with them. The world of January and February is not the world of December, and the books of January and February teach us what December did not know. Teach us, if one insists, what March and April will prove to have been but inadequate knowledge; but no one ever said that these were easy and comfortable times. Yet they are times with a challenge which the vigorous mind rejoices to accept, times in which only the vigorous mind, the mind willing at some effort to keep itself informed, can hope for effective survival. So much depends on the willingness and the ability of great numbers of people to think straight and to some end. Books offer at once the guidance and the materials.

The Position of Labor

AN aftermath of the abortive Industrial Conference of October was the gathering of representatives of more than a hundred labor unions, including the four railroad Brotherhoods, which met at Washington last week upon the call of Mr. Gompers. The result of the meeting is embodied in two pronouncements of widely different character. The country has received with a warm welcome the short and emphatic resolutions which "repudiate and condemn the policy of Bolshevism and I. W. W.-ism as being destructive to American ideals and impracticable in application." This satisfaction is lessened but not destroyed by an examination of the voluminous "bill of rights" issued at the same time, although in it there are many things which will not stand examination, from the standpoint either of American principles or of sound economic thought. In such a document—for the term "bill of rights" is a misnomer—one expects to find some crude and extravagant assertions, both of principle and of fact. Taken as a whole, the declaration does not impress us as manifesting an extreme or bitter spirit.

In particular, it should be noted that what is said about the relation between the cost of living and the rate of wages is essentially sound and reasonable. Protesting against the "belief that wages should be fixed on a cost-of-living basis," the declaration says:

This idea is pernicious and intolerable. It means putting progress in chains and liberty in fetters. It means fixing a standard of living and a standard of liberty which must remain fixed. America's workers can not accept that proposition.

Labor has a perfect right to aim at as high a standard of living as it can, by a legitimate use of the opportunities which industrial conditions present, acquire for itself. While the belief thus protested against may not be so widespread as the declaration implies, there are no doubt a great many people who imagine that some kind of natural equity fixes the remuneration of labor at about its accustomed level.

With another protest against a current opinion on the connection between wages and cost of living, we are also largely in sympathy. The labor men refuse to accept primary responsibility for the present high cost of living, and, though they commit the corresponding error of ascribing it in undue measure to profiteering and the like, they justly give the first place in the process of causation to the "inflation of money and credit." They do not mention—what is nevertheless notoriously true—that many large classes of workingmen are in the enjoyment of wages advanced upon a scale far beyond that of the cost of living; but in saying that "labor has been compelled to struggle desperately to keep wages in some measure up to the cost of living," they are right, provided it be understood that this applies not to all of "labor," but to a large part of it.

Of very different character, however, are the declarations relating to more fundamental questions. The demand "that the judges of our Federal courts shall be elected by the people for terms not exceeding six years," and the denunciation of the power exercised by those courts to pass upon the constitutionality of acts of Congress as a usurpation of authority, are in essence a demand that the Constitution, instead of being modified, if necessary, by an orderly process, shall be warped in the special interest of a class. The proposal that control over credit "should be invested in a public agency, able to administer this power as a public trust in the interest of all the people," is a wild project for which the only excuse is that its proponents have little idea of what it really means. The sweeping accusations against the forces of "reaction" which "seek to reduce wages and thus lower the standard of living," are largely the product of an inflamed imagination.

But the most important, as well as the worst, of the objectionable features of the declaration, is the stand it takes in relation to the right to strike. There might possibly be some doubt as to the absoluteness with which that right is asserted, were it not for the declaration that the right of persons employed "in national, State, and municipal service . . . to organize and affiliate with the American Federation of Labor, must at all times be fully safeguarded." It is absolutely essential to the vitality of government that its command over those directly engaged in public service be complete and unchallenged. No one is compelled to enter the public service, and if he does, he must accept the conditions upon which alone that service can be made to perform the functions for which it is instituted. Nor can there be any doubt that some restriction will have to be placed upon the right to strike in services the paralyzing of which is almost as destructive of the public weal as that of the Government itself. Yet no glimmer of recognition of this principle is to be found in the declaration.

It would be idle to deny that capitalists and employers have in the past shown a deplorable blindness in ignoring the rights both of labor and of the public. But it is equally undeniable that they have now been brought to a better mind. The signs of it are all round us; and the part of wisdom for labor is to recognize what has been gained and make the most of it, rather than to perpetuate antagonism, and to alienate public sympathy by an unreasonable attitude. In a "Statement of Principles Which Should Govern the Employment Relation in Industry," submitted by the employer group to the Industrial Conference at Washington in October, there is clear evidence of a liberal spirit. Thus on the subject of the open shop:

The principles of individual liberty and freedom of contract upon which our institutions are fundamentally based require that there should be no interference with the "open shop," that is, the shop in which membership and non-membership in any association is not made a condition of employment. While fair argument and persuasion are permissible, coercive methods aimed at turning the "open shop" into a "closed union shop" or "closed non-union shop" should not be tolerated.

The statement also recognizes the need that "each establishment should develop contact and full opportunity for interchange of view between management and men, through individual or collective dealing, or a combination of both, or by some other effective method;" and it recommends the study of plans "for adding to the fixed wage of the worker" by such plans as "bonus premiums, profit-sharing, and stock ownership." We are living in a plastic time, and it should be the endeavor of all who realize how much depends on the right use of its opportunities to find whatever is good on both sides, and thus bring about a real advance in the whole industrial situation—an advance which shall rest both upon good will and upon a genuine understanding of economic facts.

The Truth and the Newspapers

UPON no subject has the New Republic been more passionate in its exhortations than upon that of the alleged suppression of freedom of opinion in this country. In a recent issue it referred to the danger that a particular bill—which, in our judgment, it justly opposed—would "wipe out the last vestige of freedom of speech and press in the United States." In that same issue, an editorial under the head "The Call to Toleration," closed with a warning to "American educators and lawyers" that "if they begin by sacrificing freedom of speech to what is supposed to be the safety of Constitutional government, they will end by sacrificing Constitutional government to the dictatorship of a class." Surely, if the New Republic is right in its diagnosis of the situation, the matter is about as serious as anything can be.

It is a little disconcerting, therefore, to find one of the leading editors of the New Republic declaring that the issue of freedom of opinion is but "a subsidiary phase of the whole matter"; that, so long as people are "content to argue about the privileges and immunities of opinion," they are "missing the point and trying to make bricks without straw." We hasten to add that in Mr. Walter Lippman's articles in the Atlantic, from which these quotations are made, there is nothing that is inconsistent with the position of the New Republic; the point we are making is one of psychology rather than of logic: if the state of things about suppression of opinion is half so bad as the New Republic represents, it is a little difficult to imagine any one in the thick of the fray calmly referring to it as "a subsidiary phase of the whole matter," and turning his mind to quite another phase of it as being the only one worthy of really serious attention.

We are far from saying that the trouble to which Mr. Lippman draws attention is not a real one; and indeed, except in a few statements scattered here and there through the articles, he hardly exaggerates it. The difficulty of finding out the truth, in the endless maze which the complexities of present-day news presents, is no less than he represents it. And, since "true opinions can prevail only if the facts to which they refer are known," the great thing to do, according to Mr. Lippman, is to go "behind opinion to the information which it exploits"; to make "the validity of the news our ideal."

So far, so good, but how are we to go about it? Has Mr. Lippman anything to offer which gives fair promise of meeting what he represents as so desperate a need? If liberty is really in danger; if the problem that he poses is, as the title of his first article puts it, "The Basic Problem of Democracy"; if "everything else depends upon it"; if, furthermore, as the New Republic is constantly telling us, we are in imminent danger of losing even such poor liberties as we have enjoyed in the past; then the great question is, by what means is that protection to liberty to be obtained which is thus seen to be doubly indispensable to the continued working of democracy?

All that Mr. Lippman says about this is interesting, and much of it is perfectly sensible; but it gets nowhere. And it gets nowhere because, with a superficial appearance of dealing with the practical difficulties of the problem, it misses the very heart of the difficulty. Mr. Lippman wants better trained journalists; he wants men who have had a genuine discipline in the weighing of evidence, so that they may distinguish between what is trustworthy and what is doubtful or incredible; he wants men who will exercise a due sense of proportion; he wants impartiality in the presentation of news. We all want that; and though some of us think we are getting it in a far greater degree than he thinks we are, we all admit that we are not getting it so completely as is to be desired. The chief point, we take it, at which the man who really knows the nature of the difficulty will diverge from Mr. Lippman relates to the possibility of its being removed either by training, or good intentions, or systematic precautions. All these things may help; but they will leave the main difficulty just about where it was.

Let us glance at one or two of the requirements that Mr. Lippman lays down for the ideal reporting which is his aim. "Closely akin to an education in the tests of credibility is rigorous discipline in the use of words. . . . Just so long as big words like Bolshevism, Americanism, patriotism, pro-Germanism are used by reporters to cover anything and anybody that the biggest fool at large wishes to include, just so long shall we be seeking our course through a fog so dense that we can not tell whether we fly upside-down or right-side-up." Now it is very rarely that reporters talk about Americanism, or patriotism, or the rest of it, on their own hook. They use these words, either in direct quotation or otherwise, in stating the views of public characters of one kind or another. Are people in general to abstain from the use of these terms until an accurate definition of them has been arrived at and has commanded general assent? The history of any of the moral sciences affords impressive warning of what may be looked for in this direction. With the best will in the world, and with a vast amount of the keenest intelligence and the most sincere effort, economists, for example, have been unable to agree upon the definition of those terms upon which half the controversies of economic sciences have turned. But the difficulties in this case are as nothing in comparison with those that affect terms so wrapped up with emotional content as are such words as Americanism or patriotism. Desirable as it undoubtedly is that we should all of us, from the President of the United States down to the cub reporter, use words more definitely than we do, it may be set down as certain that if our ability to tell whether we are upside-down or right-side-up depends on our getting rid of that fog, we shall have to go on in this state of uncertainty to the end of the chapter.

Mr. Lippman also wants the reporter not only to desire to tell the truth, and to be equipped with such a sense for evidence, and such an accurate command of words, as to enable him to do so, but to have that kind of insight which is necessary for the detection of the true significance of news. So say we all of us; and in point of fact the most successful and most sought-after reporters of to-day owe their prominence to their possession, in one way or another, of this faculty. The trouble is that any man's estimate of the significance of news is essentially dependent upon that man's own point of view. Mr. Lippman, for example, is sternly and honestly anxious to have the news reported without bias; yet this is his ultimate formulation of the ideal reporter's attitude:

While the reporter will serve no cause, he will possess a steady sense that the chief purpose of "news" is to enable mankind to live successfully towards the future. He will know that the world is a process, not by any means always onward and upward, but never quite the same. As the observer of the signs of change, his value to society depends upon the prophetic discrimination with which he selects those signs to place before his readers.

Is it quite certain that the world will get a more accurate representation of what is going on in it by trusting to the "prophetic discrimination" of gifted super-reporters than it manages to extract out of the mass of mere ordinary reporting which the instinct of the news-gatherer now provides?

Mr. Lippman does make one practical suggestion which may quite possibly bear important fruit. He is fully conscious that the reform for which he is pleading can not come about through mere exhortation, and he proposes a definite method of compelling it:

Change will come only in the drastic competition of those whose interests are not represented in the existing news-organization. It will come only if organized labor and militant liberalism set a pace which can not be ignored. Our sanity and, therefore, our safety depend upon this competition, upon fearless and relentless exposure conducted by self-conscious groups that are now in a minority. It is for these groups to understand that the satisfaction of advertising a pet theory is as nothing compared to the publication of the news. And having realized it, it is for them to combine their resources and their talent for the development of an authentic news-service which is invincible because it supplies what the community is begging for and can not get.

That such a news-service as is here indicated would have to be reckoned with, and that it might contribute much to the public knowledge of vital facts, may be admitted. But the idea that "organized labor and militant liberalism," acting through the agency of reporters whose highest function it would be to "select" the signs of the times with "prophetic discrimination," would supply an absolutely "authentic news-service" is a notion whose naiveté makes criticism superfluous.

The trouble about getting at the truth lies deeper than reporting, and deeper than anything connected with the organization of the newspaper press. To try to improve these is a worthy and important task; but fortunately it is not true that the preservation of liberty or democracy is dependent on any such improvement as Mr. Lippman contemplates, since that improvement is out of the question in any foreseeable time. We do have to fumble our way through a vast mass of meaningless and misleading reports and assertions; but though this impedes progress, no fatal damage will befall us through the presence of this obstacle.

The direction in which important betterment may most reasonably be looked for is that of the ascertainment of facts quite different in character from those which Mr. Lippman seems to have chiefly in mind—the specific facts which affect our daily life. To deal with these things demands no superlative insight and no prophetic discrimination; but it does involve enormous difficulty, and the means of grappling with the difficulty are exceedingly meagre. In spite of all the vast apparatus of statistical bureaus, it is almost impossible to get the vital facts involved in any economic controversy. So simple a matter as the cause of the high price of milk or eggs is involved in endless doubt, not because the papers do not want to tell the truth about it, but because apparently nobody knows. When the Government tells us about the practices of the big packers, the public is left altogether in the dark as to the degree in which those practises have caused the high prices of meat, or whether they have had any part at all in causing it. When a great strike occurs, it is next to impossible to find out the vital facts about comparative wages on which, if known, the public would make up their mind as to its merits. The “high cost of living” has been with us a dozen years or more, and yet hardly anybody knows whether it is really high cost of living or merely high prices—or even knows that the two things are to be discriminated, one from the other.

We believe it would be possible to organize some kind of bureau of information whose business it would be to give out illuminating bulletins on all such questions. We do not believe that the world will perish without it; and we are fully aware that it will be an extremely difficult thing to institute it, and when instituted, to conduct it as it should be conducted. But it would be a very real and great contribution to public enlightenment—a preventive of many hysterical and futile agitations and a help towards the prosecution of genuine measures of improvement. It would need the service of a small staff of men of extremely high personal and scientific qualifications and of course of a considerable body of trained subordinates. It ought to be organized by private initiative, and its authority would have to rest entirely upon the character of the men who were placed at the head of the work. It would not be a panacea, but it would be a mighty help towards clearing out a portion of the jungle. And its example might even afford some help towards substantial improvement in the wider and more perilous field of general political and social news, over whose sad condition Mr. Lippman is so painfully concerned.

Alden Weir

THE late Alden Weir carried into American painting a quality of æsthetic conscience akin to that of Mr. Howells, and Henry James in his early phase. To make a precise and delicate record of observation was his aim. Whether his theme were a New England factory village, a bunch of roses, or a finely bred American girl, he sought to tell the true truth of the matter. While insisting on its main characteristics, he neglected none of its shades and overtones. Thus his painting, while technically austere, was mentally very rich. He saw more than most painters, and he saw better. While he had the best training of the Paris schools, there never was a more American spirit, but American in a peculiar and limited sense. From the new America of immigration and quantity production he stood quite apart.

His task was to fix the survivals of an older America. His little towns that nestle quietly in their river valleys, amid maples, are such as Thoreau loved to sketch in prose or Whittier in verse. They have a frail, intense charm. Similar is the character of that notable gallery of young girls. They are fine and earnest, trained in scruple and nicety of thought and conduct. They are the descendants of Miss Catherine Sedgwick's heroines, and of Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe's—as rare in their somewhat brittle perfection as a Colonial meeting-house rising amid blast furnaces of yesterday. An observer of any imagination will ask: Will their daughters be like them? or are they the last wintry flowers of a summer forever past?

Alden Weir was too much the artist, too good an eye and too fastidious a mind, to obtrude such legitimately sentimental considerations. These things are implied rather than underlined in his painting, but they are always there. And they give to his art a quality of race, which makes it unique. No one not an old American can understand the element of delicate truthfulness in his portraiture whether of persons or places.

To express this vision he made the fullest and most discreet use of all the resources of the new impressionism. Born May 30, 1852, at West Point, he had his first training from his father, an excellent painter and instructor in drawing at the Military Academy. Alden Weir early followed the new current to Paris. From 1872 his talent and his extraordinary masculine beauty, as of an athlete by Polyclitus, soon made him a marked personage. He worked under the best of the academic teachers, Gérôme, and soon attained a style of great ease. In the age of the morceau bien fait, few could handle the brush with more elegance. Occasional flower and game pieces survive to show that Alden Weir could have rivalled Chase in the creation of lovely surfaces and textures. But there was something to express that could not be compassed in that fashionable mode.

Returning to America in 1876, Alden Weir undertook the long task of reshaping an established style in the light of the new luminism. His mature pictures are built in an infinity of strokes and tones. The surface constitutes a restrained iridescence between the observer and the object. Unlike the Parisian luminists, he never forsook the determined contour and the well calculated pattern. His method was often unfavorably criticized. People complained of the kneaded and dissociated quality of his textures. The same objection was made to the very similar technic of George Frederick Watts, who in the decorative, as Weir in the luministic field, built up his pictures by insensible increments reflecting his own thoughtfulness. Current criticism never is quite just to pictures that to attain their end must be much thought over and worked over. All the world loves a juggler, in whatever art.

To Alden Weir came a slow and solid recognition. The National Academy made him an associate in 1885, and a member in 1886. He was a leading figure in the Society of American Artists, and later in the Ten American Painters. He was for several years President of the National Academy. While his practice was early crystallized, his taste remained liberal. He was unafraid of the new experiments and eccentricities, having a quiet confidence that in the long run the more excellent methods would prevail. Probably no artist of our day in America was more generally respected or more genuinely admired by both conservatives and radicals.

Among his peers he was at once an imposing and a winning personality—strong, sensitive, resolutely honest, courteous without affectation or compromise. His pictures are in the Luxembourg and our best American galleries. He had full and deserved meed of honor, and regarded it modestly as merely an incentive to new endeavor. Even in his latter invalidism, he retained much of that classic beauty which is perpetuated by Orrin Warner in one of the greatest of American portrait busts.

It is too early to appraise Alden Weir's accomplishments justly. No one but his friend Twachtman has expressed so well certain evanescent appearances in our American landscape. His series of women's portraits breathe training and discipline in pictorial intimations which are paradoxically precise and subtle. Whatever his final position as a painter, he has been immensely significant to us of older America. It is not likely that he will be neglected by the new America which is about to fulfill or supersede us.

The Russian National Movement

THE energetic correspondent of the New York "Times," Mr. Walter Duranty, has recently communicated much interesting information concerning affairs in the Baltic, but it is unfortunate that from that isolated point of observation he should also have indulged in generalizations concerning the national movement in other parts of Russia. If these generalizations were to be accepted as true, it would appear that the campaigns led by Kolchak and Denikin were attempts to restore a Tsarist régime in Russia and were not based upon popular support, whereas exactly the contrary is true.

No one can trace the history of these two great movements of the constructive forces in Russia to restore the national Russian state without feeling a thrill of admiration at what has been accomplished in the face of almost insurmountable obstacles. Admiral Kolchak raised an army out of the sparse population of Siberia, drove back beyond the Urals Red forces that outnumbered his own at least three to one, and only succumbed when his troops found themselves almost entirely without munitions and supplies. There is a double tragedy in this, in that the Allies and America, entirely satisfied with his liberal policy and aims, had promised him support, and this support was not forthcoming. The result has been the overrunning of all Western Siberia by the Bolsheviks, and all that that means of suffering and degradation for the Russian people. In the South, a little body of but four hundred men, led by the indomitable Alexeiev and his successor, Denikin, kept alive the struggle against the Bolsheviks. Out of this nucleus grew the Volunteer Army, which suffered incredible hardships, cut off from all support, until finally it won through to the Black Sea after the armistice and then, for the first time, learned of Germany's defeat. Receiving substantial aid from England, this force grew rapidly, and, by its remarkable campaign of last summer, swept north and liberated some thirty million people from the clutches of the Soviet Government. The enthusiasm with which the Russian people welcomed them may be judged from the fact that on the freeing of Kiev, over 19,000 volunteers from that city joined Denikin's colors. But Denikin is dependent upon an area of territory that is utterly disorganized and incapable of furnishing military supplies, whereas the Bolshevik power has at its disposal the vast reserves of munitions left from the war, and has not had to manufacture any.

That either of these two branches of the Russian national movement is in any sense an attempt to restore the old régime is entirely false. It is undoubtedly true that among the supporters both of Denikin and of Kolchak are many conservatives and reactionaries, but they do not in any way direct the policy, nor are they indeed so numerous as the officials and supporters of the old régime that are to be found in the ranks of the Bolshevik forces.

It is important to us in America to know the probable effect of a failure of these national movements. The Bolshevik experiment has entirely failed to obtain popular support in Russia, and rules by terror. It has likewise brought economic ruin and put an end to production. It has, however, built up a strong military machine, which, according to the best available information, now has at least 450,000 soldiers of the line. Not more than 100,000 of these, and at that the least efficient, are engaged on the northwestern front. Although much has been made in the press of the prowess of the Letts, Esthonians, and Poles, the real work of detaining the main body of the Bolshevik army has been done by the poorly equipped but devoted forces of Denikin and Kolchak, and this in the face of disappointment and discouragement. If these movements fail and the Soviet Government is able to dispose of an army of nearly half a million men for the purpose of spreading the Bolshevik revolution by force of arms into Eastern Europe, the outlook is indeed dark. There is no force in Poland or Czechoslovakia that could withstand the onslaught, and Germany, cherishing bitter resentment toward the Allies, and in desperation over her own situation, would welcome a coalition with such a formidable military force. Indeed, the preliminary steps for such a development have undoubtedly already been taken by Krasin, the pro-German Commissar of Trade and Industry, and by the host of German officers serving in the Bolshevik army.

The question arises as to whether we have, at such a terrible cost, defeated German Kaiserism only to fall victims to a still more dangerous imperialism. Kaiserism, hateful as it was, did not purpose the destruction of culture, whereas the new imperialism threatens the very foundations of our civilization. In its present form, the question is primarily one of military force. Common sense says that if we can sustain effectively the liberal Russian national movements until the autocracy at Moscow shall have collapsed or have been overthrown from the inside, we may thereby, at no human cost to ourselves, avert the menace of a still greater war than the one brought to a close a year ago. Strong and speedy support of the Russian people in their present crisis may save Europe from the conditions of the Thirty Years War and spare us enormous sacrifices in the future.

The Peace With Bulgaria

WHEN the peace terms, which Premier Stambuliski, a fortnight ago, signed at Neuilly, were presented to Bulgaria, we gave as our comment at the time that their most striking feature was their lack of finality, as the questions how to dispose of the Dobrudja and of Western Thrace were left unsettled. The difficulty that faced the conference was chiefly that the only enemy of the Entente in the Balkans was also the most promising among the States. Bulgaria had to be punished for her complicity with the Central Powers, but also she had to be spared as the chief importer of Western culture in those untutored parts. A liberal educational system has carried the Bulgarian far ahead of his Serbian and Rumanian neighbors. Punishment without clemency would have sacrificed the future.

The United States representatives were the advocates of the lenient policy. The upshot of the deliberations was unavoidably a compromise, but the compromise is of the worst nature: a decision not to settle the most vexed issues. The Dobrudja was taken from Bulgaria by way of punishment, but not straightforwardly ceded to Rumania, as there seemed to be ethnical reasons for assigning at least part of it to Bulgaria after all. This half-hearted procedure was repeated with regard to Western Thrace. It was not given to Greece, but the principal Allied and Associated Powers reserved to themselves the right to dispose of it at some future date by transferring part of it to Greece and incorporating the remainder with Eastern Thrace as an international state or by returning all or part of the territory to Bulgaria.

This scrupulous avoidance of a decision will, in its effects, be more disastrous even than the cocksure handling of the same material by the Conference of Berlin in 1878. The indefinite status of those two contested territories will prove the source of new unrest and war. This is the more regrettable as the present conjuncture offered a unique opportunity for arriving at something like a definitive settlement. Of the four principal factors that made for war in the past, three have lost, temporarily at least, their power for evil: Turkish misrule, Austrian distrust of Russian Pan-Slavism, and Germany's "Drang nach Osten." It is only the rivalry between the Balkan States themselves that has survived the conflagration. It should have been felt as an imperative duty by the Great Powers assembled through their representatives at Paris, to quench that smouldering fire by the vigorous exercise of their power definitely to prescribe the future boundaries.

In one instance, indeed, they have done so: by assigning to Serbia the Strumitza district of Macedonia, a measure evidently destined to safeguard the Saloniki railroad from a Bulgarian attack. But this strategic gain is obtained at the cost of something more precious: the good neighborhood of Bulgarians and Serbs, between whom the Macedonian question has been a bone of contention, since the Treaty of Berlin provided that Bosnia and Herzegovina should be occupied and administered by Austria. From that time on, Serbia, balked of her hope to achieve a union with those Serbian lands, sought to make up for the disappointment by extending the limits of Serbian nationality to the south. In 1889 Serbia even concluded a treaty with Austria under which she waived her claims to Bosnia and Herzegovina in exchange for Austria's support to Serbia in penetrating the valley of the Vardar. The world war, however, has realized the Serbian aspirations towards a union of all Serbian and Croatian nationalities, and thus removed the chief cause of discord between Serbia and Bulgaria. But the Peace Treaty of Neuilly, in establishing Serbia's right to part of Bulgarian Macedonia, threatens to keep the old conflict alive.

Even more dangerous than this decision on strategic instead of on ethnical grounds is the postponement of a decision as to the fate of Southern Dobrudja, Western Thrace, and what is left of European Turkey. The Dobrudja was forced upon Rumania in 1878, as compensation for that part of Bessarabia which the Berlin Conference assigned to Russia. The Bulgarians hold that since Rumania has annexed the whole of Bessarabia, the Dobrudja should revert to its former owners. The southern part, the district between Silistria and the sea, is unquestionably a Bulgarian land, and the Powers, by leaving its fate uncertain, furnish the Bulgarians with food for anti-Rumanian agitation. Nor is the animosity between Greeks and Bulgarians likely to subside as a result of the peace of Neuilly. The Greeks have a strong claim to the whole of Thrace and, on historical grounds, to the city of Constantinople, and if they were allowed to expand their territory at the expense of the hated Turk, both in Europe and along the Greek coast of Asia Minor, their gain would bring a two-fold advantage—it would rid Europe both of her Asiatic intruder, and of Greco-Bulgarian hostilities. The redemption of their brethren under Turkish rule would reconcile the Greeks to the Bulgarians receiving a corridor to the Aegean Sea, as promised them under the Neuilly Treaty. But the Powers have made this promise without at the same time creating the conditions which alone can prevent its execution from arousing fresh animosity and strife. The Thracian question, together with that of Constantinople, has been left pending in the apparently ill-founded expectation that the United States would accept a mandate for the city, and an area of some extent outside.

The difficulty of dispensing justice all round is no sufficient excuse for this failure to arrive at a definite settlement. The great Powers together formed an imposing alliance which could have prescribed its will to all the rival states. The creation of a fixed status, even at the risk of injuring here or there some national susceptibilities, would have been preferable to this continuance of uncertainty which keeps ambitions hopeful of their satisfaction, and rivals envious and suspicious of each other.

M. GABRIEL HANOTAUX, the French historian and former Minister of Foreign Affairs, appears to have exercised great influence on the conduct of affairs during the war as an unofficial adviser of the Government. In a recent book on the Treaty of Versailles he has printed a memorandum submitted by him to the French Headquarters on November 11, 1918, in which he unfolded his ideas as to the course that should be taken. "As a necessary premise," he wrote, "be it stated that we must conclude a 'grand' peace. A 'grand' peace implies the organization of Europe. In order to bring about that organization we must first of all form a nucleus of closely allied nations, three Powers on a similar level of culture. That will constitute a certain ascendancy over the other allies, and also a certain disjunction from the United States. It would be a great danger if we put America out of temper. We owe her our gratitude for the help she has given us in evil days, and she represents a great power which can counterbalance the power of others, and can form a court of arbitration. In her, also, is embodied the ideal and the democratic principle. But that does not alter the fact that it is the Powers of Europe that are especially concerned in European questions. Those affairs are our proper domain."

The meeting in London of M. Clemenceau, Mr. Lloyd George and the Foreign Minister of Italy seems the beginning of that nucleus which M. Hanotau had in mind when he addressed himself to the French Headquarters. America's voluntary disjunction from Europe has, from M. Hanotau's standpoint, the beneficent effect of impressing the Governments of the three great Entente Powers with the need of removing all disruptive matter that may thwart its growth. The Fiume tangle seems to be nearing a settlement, thanks to this renewed consolidation of the signatories of the Treaty of London. If recent dispatches from Italy present the situation correctly, the United States will be confronted with a fait accompli, France and Great Britain having given their sanction to the annexation of the city by Signor Nitti's Government. Europe is taking the management of her affairs into her own hands, and, unhampered by American interference, sets out to restore her domestic peace herself. Thus indirectly Mr. Lodge, by his opposition to the peace of Mr. Wilson's making, appears to become the pacificator of Europe in the manner M. Hanotau would like to see it pacified.

From the French point of view, this development of events has certainly much to recommend it. Domestic peace is best secured where the master of the house has undivided control. But the difficulty is that the European family will not recognize France as its master. It wants a League of Nations in which each member of the family has a voice which safeguards the national right of self-control, it does not want to be controlled by a League of Conquerors. For to that the Alliance amounts which M. Hanotau would charge with the organization of Europe. By its present authority it doubtless can pacify Europe more effectively than the cumbrous machinery of the League of Nations could, but its temporary efficiency in the curing of present evils does not prove that the lasting welfare of Europe, and the world at large, would be best secured by the continuance of this tripartite government. It may answer its purpose as a maker of peace in the present emergency; if it were to become permanent it would tend to the undoing of its own work. Germany having recuperated her strength would never brook its control. The neutral nations, though powerless to resist it, would resent their enforced obedience to its rulings. No peace can be lasting which is not the object of the joint control of all its participants. A triple Alliance for the organization of Europe can not fulfill the function of an international League, with the United States as a disinterested partner, for the peaceful maintenance of a Europe thus organized.

Labor Not a Commodity

What might be toward, that this sweaty haste
Doth make the night joint-labourer with the day,
Who is't that can inform me?

WHEN Marcellus thus queried as to the bustle in the war industries of the Danes, he gave a simile of the union of labor and capital of our time. They are in essence as different as night from day, and yet are as irrevocably bound together as are night and day by the rotation of the earth. Labor is the effort of human beings in industry; while capital is the outcome of an abstinence from consumption of past production, in order to have a fund with which to enlarge the efficiency of labor—provided they can work together coöperatively. Impersonal capital is transferable at a price by its owner to another's use, as when a farmer hires out his horse; but labor can not be detached from its personal author, and is offered at a price only in company with the laborer himself. Thus, these two factors of production belong in entirely different categories; they are entirely different in kind; but both are absolutely necessary to the common end. Therefore, we are apt to be led into some confusion when we pass on to the question of the relative remuneration for their services to production.

Wages are paid for human effort; yet the laborer remains a freeman; he does not sell himself, but he sells his mental or physical qualities during a specified time, for wages. If a drainage ditch is to be dug and there are legions of unemployed men ready to work, the physical labor required is certain to be offered in competition at a less price than if men were scarce. This truth is demonstrated every day, in many a country. What else keeps wages low in India, or in China? On the other hand, if war sucks up men into the army and carries them off to France, taking away machinists and hired men at will from shop and farm, a feverish demand for a diminished number of workers sends up their price. This is a matter of common knowledge. We can not escape the facts of our every-day life. Moreover, trade unions are formed on the very assumption that wages can be raised by a limitation of competitors. Still further, the main reason for the higher remuneration of skilled workers is that they are, by the very fact of possessing superior skill, less numerous relatively to the demand for them than the unskilled. That relative scarcity or abundance affects the rate of wages does not imply that human beings are like commodities, but only that human effort at any given time or place may vary in supply and consequently in price. Doctors of philosophy were at one time so numerous in Germany before the war that they commanded little more than starvation wages. Therefore, to rant about the crime of treating labor as a commodity is like making a crime out of the law of gravity. And for employers (as was recently proposed) in the give and take of the industrial conflict to grant that labor is not a commodity is like trying to get credit for a compromise by admitting that gasoline will never run an engine. Whatever our casual words, the forces of nature go on just the same.

This new philosophy of labor, however, goes farther. It proposes to put labor on "a new footing." Sitting in his chair of state King Canute forbids the waves of the sea from rising up the beach. Observing that natural forces prevent unskilled labor from getting the rewards of monopoly it is valiantly proposed to make a thing so by saying that it is so. With our itch for overcoming nature, and the imperfections of human beings, by legal enactments, in the Clayton Act of 1914, Congress, at the behoof of Labor leaders, announced "that the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce." Did that law make it so? Certainly it did, but only in the purely legalistic, not in the economic, sense. For legalistic purposes it was intended to exclude combinations of labor from the provisions of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act. That is, illegal combinations organized to deal with impersonal goods were forbidden; but organizations dealing with human labor were supposed not to be engaged in trade. Of course, organizations of labor had not been, and could not be, forbidden; and even now, if unions or any other combinations violate the law, they can be indicted.

This theory that labor is not a commodity, however, is being pushed for reasons quite other than legalistic ones. To obtain sympathy for a cause, an appeal to sentiment, when argument fails, is generally effective. Covered by the catchword that labor is not to be treated as merchandise, is the intent to insist that the wages of labor should not be affected by the operation of a relative abundance or scarcity of labor; that is, that wages should be paid without any regard to scarcity or abundance of labor relatively to the existing demand for it. It follows as a corollary that skilled labor, occupying a position of relative scarcity over unskilled labor, has no claim to higher wages. There is, after that, only one short step to equality of wages for all men, that is, to communism. The descent to Avernus is easy. If the wages of labor are not to be regarded as affected by its abundance or scarcity, by what supplanting principle is it to be regulated when on its new footing? Nothing definite has been proposed on this point. When pounding the table of Senator Kenyon's committee, Fitzpatrick roared only for "justice, decent justice."

But it is unfair to expect the builders of the new social order, while so busy in tearing down the old fabric, to have had time and gray matter to give to so unimportant a question as the principle regulating wages.

In a large and vague way, however, it has been proposed to keep wages as high as ever, even if goods fall in price, or to demand a share in the control of industry. Thus, if seated at the head of the table as carver of the roast, labor could determine the size of its own slice and leave the bone to the other partners. And why not? Has not capital been giving labor only the bone in the past? In the new order there is to be a change in the president of the feast. In such a proposal they are reckoning without the cook and the provider. Where did the roast come from, anyway? To claim that labor produced it all, is to talk unadulterated Marxian socialism; that labor is the sole cause of value. By way of a trial marriage, let labor and risk try out living together alone, leaving despised capital to a silent solitude. As soon as they find they can not get on without shelter and furniture, without factory and machinery—to say nothing of daily bread and materials out of which to fashion the product to be placed on the table before the carver—they break out with a tirade on the existing social system; that the rights of property are the main cause of crime; and that capitalists are robbers, whose savings should be taken over by the state, so that the unthrifty may share the results of thrift. That way madness and Russia lies.

Partnership and a share in the control of industry, of course, can come only by an arrangement through which the possessors of factories and equipment voluntarily agree upon coöperative action with labor and expert management, and a full understanding as to where the risk of success and failure falls. Some of the clamor for a solution of the labor problem by granting a share in the control of industry is probably intended by a few honest minds to place the labor contingent in a position where they can see for themselves in competitive industries that there are not excess profits to share. Certainly, for one instance, the railway Brotherhoods know they could not enlarge their wages out of the profits of the railways; hence their demands on the Government that will lay the increase on the weary taxpayer.

Nevertheless, apart from a justifiable

desire to have a voice as to working conditions, the main demand for a share in the control of industry—when it is not purely revolutionary socialism—is based on a hope to create a form of productive coöperation. Such a form of industry is easily obtainable, where labor itself can furnish the capital and management.

But it is asking the impossible, when labor can not provide the capital and management, to ask those in established industries who possess these essential factors, to agree to grant their results to those who have them not, and who are relieved from all risk of success or failure.

J. LAURENCE LAUGHLIN

The Ukrainian Kaleidoscope

IT is indicative of the confusion of Eastern European affairs and of the size of the problems presented by them that a vast territory containing perhaps the richest agricultural lands and natural resources of Europe, and inhabited by some twenty-five million people, should constitute for us a veritable terra incognita at the present moment. There is, indeed, less accurate information coming out to us concerning what is taking place in the region known as the Ukraine than from Soviet Russia. Yet this region and its problems can not but exert an enormous influence on the settlement of European affairs, and indeed it may be asserted that the restoration of agricultural and industrial production in the Ukraine is a fundamental necessity for the resumption of normal economic life in other parts of Europe.

The situation is confused for many reasons. There are cross currents, political, social, and economic, and various intermixtures of all three, so that it is impossible to draw general conclusions based upon developments in any one field. There are, however, certain basic facts upon which must rest any analysis by which it is hoped to clarify the present situation.

The basic problem of the Ukraine is and has been the economic problem as related to the land, in other words, the agrarian question. The people of the Ukraine constitute simply a branch of the Russian stock. The Malo-Russ dialect is, to be sure, slightly different from the Great Russian, but there is not connected with this, in the minds of the mass of the people, the slightest sense of nationalism or any feeling of separatism. If you ask a Ukrainian peasant his nationality, he very likely will say: "I am a peasant." The word "Ukraina" simply means "border-land" or "frontier region," and while the region includes the earliest Cossack settlements, the mass of the peasant population is perhaps more purely Russian in descent than the Great Russians themselves.

It is necessary to bear this clearly in mind as a corrective to the extensive propaganda carried on for a number of years in the attempt to develop a nationalist and separatist Little Russian movement. This propaganda was in accord with the policy laid down by Bismarck, looking to the weakening and dismemberment of Russia, and it was vigorously pursued by Austria for at least two decades preceding the war. There are in the Ukraine three general classes: the peasants, and among them the industrial laborers; the land-owners and public officials, and the intelligentsia, or professional classes. As stated above, there was among the peasant class, which forms the bulk of the population, absolutely no separatist feeling; their economic interests bound them closely to Russia. The land-owning class, like the officials, were Russian in their sympathies. It was the small class of intelligentsia upon whom the Austrians worked, and who saw in Ukrainian independence an opportunity to satisfy their political ambitions.

The revolution of March, 1917, was welcomed by the Ukrainians with the same general rejoicing as by the rest of Russia, and was regarded by them as an action in common for the winning of democratic liberty. Not much time passed, however, before a group was formed of the intelligentsia which carried on an active agitation to secure from the Provisional Government Ukrainian autonomy. The Rada fell under the influence of this group, and when the Provisional Government decided that the question of autonomy must be left to the Constituent Assembly, this Rada, on June 24, 1917, itself proclaimed Ukrainian autonomy. As a result, the Provisional Government consented to establish a special ministry for Ukrainian affairs, under Vinnichenko, and made concessions to the Rada which, in general, encouraged the forces that made for separation. In spite of this, it must be noted that the movement for independence was entirely artificial, and that Ukrainian opinion was in favor of autonomy within a united Russia, as was definitely shown when a Pan-Ukrainian Congress of peasants' delegates at Kiev, in September, 1917, adopted a resolution to this effect. The proponents of independence, however, were not satisfied, and started an agitation among the other nationalities, calling a Congress later in September, composed of representatives of the Ukrainians, Tatars, Georgians, Cossacks of the Don, Lithuanians, Jews, and Letts. This Congress, while not declaring in favor of independence, resolved that Russia should become a Federated Democratic Republic, and that the Russian delegation at the future Peace Conference should contain representatives of the nationalities interested, that the Russian army should be reorganized on nationalistic lines, and that separate national legislative assemblies should be convoked in order to determine the relations of the different members of the Federation to the Central Government.

It was while this agitation was going on that the Bolshevik coup d'état took place at Petrograd, and this changed the situation materially. Immediately the Rada proclaimed the Ukraine an independent republic and chose Golubovich as premier president.

Two dangers threatened the Ukraine: on the one hand, the spread of Bolshevism, and on the other, an invasion on the part of Germany. It so happened that the Rada, in order to rid itself of the pro-Russian, land-owning and official class, had encouraged the peasants in the seizure of estates. Now they saw before them the prospect of a coalescence of their own population with the Bolshevik movement in Russia. Their fear was heightened because of the formation in industrial centres of workmen's and soldiers' Soviets. When they themselves entered the negotiations at Brest-Litovsk, they found themselves confronted by the delegation from the Soviets, contesting their right to represent the Ukraine.

Presently the Soviet authorities drove them out of Kiev, and Golubovich called in German assistance. It was, of course, the expectation of the German-controlled Rada that the Germans were there to back them up in the dismemberment of Russia, and only too late did they realize that the chief object of Germany was to secure food. To this end the Germans, first of all, started to restore the land-owners as a means of increasing the food supply. This naturally alienated and infuriated the peasants, and the Rada found itself between the upper and the nether millstone, hated by the land-owners, against whom they had abetted the peasants, and hated by the peasants for bringing in the Germans. The feelings of the peasant class may be realized when it is remarked that by a clause of the agreement with the Germans the Ukraine promised to furnish 576,000 tons of wheat before the next harvest. As a matter of fact, they obtained, up to the time of the armistice, but 64,000 tons. Golubovich was obliged to resign, and the law and order crowd gathered around Skoropadski, who, in April, 1918, was proclaimed Hetman. This choice met with the approval of the Germans, and Skoropadski became their willing co-worker. Although he carried out harsh measures for the restoration of order and for the elimination of the local authorities that had been chosen in the towns and in the country districts, Skoropadski did not show any particular capacity for government, and conditions did not improve. It must be remarked, however, that in spite of their requisitions, the Germans handled the local food situation with skill, and the inhabitants were far better provided for than under later administrations.

With the defeat of the Central Powers, another quick change took place. Skoropadski endeavored to shift quickly to a pro-Entente orientation, but did not succeed in winning the confidence and support of the Allies, although he went so far as to publish, on November 14, a declaration of federation with Russia.

Shortly afterwards a revolution broke out against him, and there is little doubt that the leaders of the German occupation played an important part in inciting it. At this time, Petlura was under arrest in Kiev. These military chiefs demanded and secured Petlura's release, and presently he made his way to Belaia Tserkov, where he placed himself at the head of a regiment of Ukrainian troops, some eight hundred in number. This movement, which had in reality been carefully prepared in advance, grew rapidly, and presently succeeded in overthrowing Skoropadski and taking possession of the capital. A Directory of five members was formed, and on December 17 took up its headquarters at Kiev. The assumption of power by the Directory was accompanied by a mass of arrests and executions, and stringent orders were issued forbidding all agitation and propaganda unfavorable to the new Government.

Meanwhile Petlura and the Directory found considerable difficulty in dealing with the Bolsheviks in their midst, who carried on an active agitation in the army. A number of these agitators were shot, and Petlura telegraphed to Denikin, proposing a programme of common action against Bolshevism. The Soviet Government, however, pretended that it was ready to recognize the independence of the Ukraine, and Petlura, deceived by their friendly words, entered into agreement whereby in return the Directory legalized the existence of a Bolshevik party in the Ukraine and authorized its propaganda, provided it were not directed against the rule of the Directory. This was a fatal mistake, and in a short time the clever and lying propaganda of the Bolsheviks developed serious difficulties for the Government throughout the entire extent of the country.

While Petlura professed the doctrines of the Social Democratic party, and sought their support, it must be said that in general, in the absence of any popular support, his actual programme and policy differentiated him but little from the Bolsheviks of Russia. He succeeded, indeed, in putting down the Bolsheviks within his borders, and carried on war against Bolshevik Russia, but there was little to choose between them. It soon became evident that he was in reality only an adventurer, taking advantage of the unrest and disorders arising from the agrarian situation, to lead a horde of Ukrainian marauders against a similar crowd of Russians.

On December 11, 1918, he succeeded in occupying Odessa, a city entirely Russian in its sympathies and relations, which could not properly be connected with any purely Ukrainian movement, but Odessa and its surrounding territory had been occupied only a week when a detachment of the Volunteer Army, supported by the French and other Allied troops, reoccupied it. The disgraceful story of the French occupation, with its profiteering in foodstuffs, its machinations against Denikin, and its shameful evacuation of the city to the Bolsheviks, forms a black chapter.

Petlura's subsequent movements and changes of policy are difficult to follow. The only part of the Ukraine which has had any real interest in separatism and independence is Galicia, and Petlura himself is of Galician origin. Naturally, he counted most of all upon the support of the agrarian populations, and played up their desires to seize land and retain the properties that they had taken from the land-owners. He looked with jealousy upon the rapid successes of Denikin and the Volunteer Army, because he knew that this meant the reuniting of Russia. Under these conditions, it was not possible to find a basis for common action against the Bolsheviks, and the further advance of Denikin led to open conflict with Petlura's troops. Common action would very likely have resulted in the crushing of the Soviet power, but Petlura, as an ambitious adventurer, must needs play his own hand and appeal to a factitious nationalism in the Ukraine. Of the latest developments definite news is lacking. Apparently, however, Petlura's forces are disintegrating, and only Denikin's difficulties in his struggle against Soviet Russia prevent his bringing the whole Ukraine under the South Russian Government.

That one day the Ukraine must again become part of a united Russia, albeit with proper reservations as to autonomy, seems unavoidable, both because there is no real desire for independence on the part of the people, and because it is completely bound up with Great Russia by economic ties. The natural course of action to restore peace and prosperity in the Ukraine, with all that this means to troubled Europe, is the support of the forces led by Denikin in their struggle for the Russian national state.

Old Worlds and Young Doughboys

IT was actually a new world that opened its arms to us who were fortunate enough to be sent across in 1917 and 1918—a new world not in the sense in which we usually apply the term to our bristling western hemisphere, but new to everyone of us who had either forgotten or never known its quality. The grey age of its port towns, the hoary Brittany buildings, the gnarled trees grotesquely pruned of their branches to provide the meagre maximum of firewood, the long white roads lined with poplars and sycamores, all these aged things were new to us. New also was Paris, beautiful beyond describing, though it was centuries old when our land was still unborn. And newest of all, behind and beyond the loveliness which man had created to adorn the land, was the rhythm of a great spirit, a spirit drawing strength from millions of past lives well lived, a spirit which is the real France, which upheld and inspired all the Allied peoples through those dark days of waiting after August, 1914.

With all this new atmosphere to sense and experience, with the gates of Europe open as never before to two million young, eager, and observing Americans, it is curious that the great lessons of life that were to be learned have not yet been more clearly understood, though it is perhaps too soon to appraise the effect of France and England on the migratory A. E. F. The things of the spirit are not always easily evaluated and unconsciously much has doubtless been tasted that has not yet been perfectly digested. It seemed the opinion, however, of practically all Americans, that even the tiniest suburb outside Newark or Chicago was preferable to the romantic though unsanitary villages and cities of France. Of course, over there everybody was thinking mainly of getting home—that is something to our credit—and so it is perhaps not wholly fair to say that we have permanently failed to get at the meaning of France and England.

However that may be, it was an almost unanimous verdict that was handed down, for little was favorably commented upon that had real worth. To be sure, everyone wanted to see Paris, Notre Dame, the Louvre, the Eiffel Tower, the Arc de Triomphe, and Nice; all wanted to visit London. But seeing rather than understanding and interpreting was the dominant desire, just as sending a postcard from the other side of the border of Spain or Italy seemed far more important to the average doughboy than visiting the ruins of Fréjus, or the old town of St. Jean Pied du Port. The American wished to see the France he had heard of in America, not France as she could reveal herself to those whose eyes were clear. The France of beauty and art, of cathedral and château, of homely peasant life, the land of deep family devotion and loyalty, yes, even in the grip of war, the land of peace of the spirit, was judged by the standards of America.

We sailed from New York, giant victory of modern technical skill, and landed at Brest or Bordeaux, grey and twisted, with their ancient streets and their thousand years of history and tradition. Of course, there was no heat in any of the buildings, there was no such thing as plumbing, the people evidently did not bathe, the streets were badly cobbled and dirty, the tram lines were archaic and we did not quite understand the idea of having the manure pile in the front yard. The contrast with America was very marked, for we had to change the dynamic of the new world for the subtlety of the old, and we were all far too sure of our own superiority. To leave America and land in some half-broken old village in three weeks was a severe shock to the average doughboy, and the loss of every vestige of material comfort rather closed what might otherwise have been an open eye.

The truth is, we did not go over to learn. We went over to help finish up a nasty mess in our usual vigorous and speedy way, and incidentally to show the Britisher and the poilu what America could do. The tragedy of the war is that we did show them, because just when the scales were balanced, when both sides were panting and worn, we poured in three hundred thousand fresh reserves a month, the pick of a nation of one hundred and ten million, and, of course, "we won the war"! And in doing so we were unfortunately confirmed in our original idea of American superiority; we came back without any conscious sense of our failure to read England as she is to the English or France as she is to the French.

And yet, now that we are back, many of us feel a tremendous sense of unrest, for we are back in an atmosphere that has somehow become strange to us. Unconsciously the sense of perfection, the simplicity, the beauty, the lingering atmosphere of past ages, the spiritual halo that hovers over France and England, all those subtle, charming, and gracious qualities of life have become a part of our new experience, and though we can not define it, we feel uneasy in our tense American cities. We do not know just what is wrong with us, but somehow life's values seem inverted. Are quantity production, speed, complexity, and the amassing of wealth the things really worth living and dying for, we ask? And we wonder if our vague national altruism can ever really spiritualize these material things.

turies of Puritan ancestry and thirty years of Boston upbringing and Harvard training were perhaps not the ideal preparation for an appreciation of France, except possibly by contrast. For there is not much over there that suggests anything of the type of thought dignified for years in this country by the title of New England puritanism. However, it is certain to me, as never before, that the French with all their unattractive though necessary thriftiness, their somewhat childish acceptance of old theories, their readiness to say "it never has been, therefore it can't be done," have come nearer the answer to life than any other western people, save, in their equally distinctive though different way, the British.

The French do not care for speed or great factories, though they were forced to accept the latter by the pressure of war. They do not care for the dazzling recreation of our Broadway. They are simple in their tastes, find delight in real conversation, devoted to their families, gracious in hospitality. On the faces of the refugees fleeing from their burning villages with their few heirlooms piled high on the ox-cart, was written the depth of tragedy; but to see them returning to their pile of crumbled stone and charred wood, as soon as the invader was again driven back, was to realize the true heart of France, devoted till death to the ancestral hearth.

We thought they were provincial, untraveled, unacquainted with all our modern marvels. We thought them foolish not to want such things for themselves. Perhaps they are. But we too were very provincial in our own way. Most of us failed to see the real charm of the life of France, its depth of feeling and emotion, its simplicity, its graciousness, which in living deeply far out-balances express elevators and plumbing.

But those who did sense the heart of France, who drew close to its charm, its peace, its beauty, are now filled with a desire to go back. It is not that we love America less than before our participation in the war, but because we love life more. We want to see these real things a part of our own culture and tradition, and we want our fellow countrymen to appreciate and love those things we felt in France, and to graft them into the scheme of life. Because we have begun to realize and to believe that they are really worth living for, because we know there is a way of life more gracious and charming and pleasant which can not be found amid rush and noise and muddle, and because we deeply need and desire that same peace of spirit and that sense of the true values of living which we found in those lands which have learned that in beauty and simplicity one touches life at the source.

KARL SPRINGER CATE

Correspondence

Mexico and the League

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

What makes the Mexicans behave so? Is it just pure devilishness, or is there some outside influence egging them on? There may be some truth in both suggestions, but it is very far from being the whole story. The bottom fact is that they hate us and fear us—hate us because they fear us.

But why should they hate us? We don't mean them any harm. It would seem as if that were evident from the almost pusillanimous treatment they have received from us ever since the fall of Diaz. Haven't we borne with humiliating patience insults and injuries that we would not have endured for a moment from a nation of our own size?

Very true. But we do queer things to Mexico which the Mexicans regard as harm to them, and which we should regard as harm to us, if we were Mexicans. And we mean them as much in peace as in war. Most of us mean them, without knowing it.

How so? Just this; we feel that, not only there should be sufficient law and order in Mexico so that our citizens on the frontier shall be secure in their lives and property, but also that they should be free to go and come in Mexico, and to take their part in the development of its natural resources. There is where the shoe pinches. For what does this development of natural resources mean to the Mexican? Servitude, does it not? They will inevitably become the subordinates, the employees, while the Gringos buy up the land and own the country. Nor will these Gringos, Americans mostly, be of the type of which we are most proud. Few will go into Mexico, except on the chance of making "big money." Consideration for the rights and aspirations of the "Dagoes" and "Greasers" will not be their prime characteristic.

On the other hand, of course, the Mexicans do not want war with us. They realize well enough that war means not only defeat, but something like permanent occupation. It is the same fate they see before them whether it be peace or war. Is it any wonder they do not like us?

What they really want is that we shall keep out, and leave them alone; so, more or less of set purpose, they are making it as hot as possible for all foreigners who try to do business in their country. So far as I can judge, about every conceivable method has been tried to this end.

But, how about our side of it? Can we continue to permit border raids, and the maltreatment of our citizens in Mex-

But do we want to go in there with a big army of occupation and hold the country in subjection for an indefinite number of years in order to secure the advantages named? Evidently that is what would be involved. Undoubtedly we could do it, but it isn't altogether an attractive prospect.

We have many real grievances; but it doesn't look quite right that we should constitute ourselves the complaining witness, prosecuting attorney, judge, jury, executioner, and residuary legatee all in one. We might go in with the highest motives; but the rest of the world would never believe it, and after a while the residuary legatee end of the business would loom large in the minds of many of us. The rest of the world would never have any doubt of it from the beginning. In particular, all Latin America would regard us with fierce hatred, not likely to die out for many generations. They would say: "So this is what the Monroe Doctrine means. It is just what we have known for some time, and here is the proof of it." And the other Latin nations of the world would chime in, Italy doubtless with a jeer or two about Fiume, and a suggestion about straining at gnats, and the rest.

France would remind us that we objected pretty strongly when she tried something of the same kind. Japan would certainly feel aggrieved, and England would not like it any too well, though she might in some measure understand our attitude.

Then some one would be sure to say, "So this is why you wouldn't join the League of Nations." Of course it wouldn't be true as to most of those who have opposed the League, but it would look unpleasantly like it. Provided the Senate continues to make it impossible for us to join it, there would seem to be a rather unfortunate coincidence. Some might even go so far as to compare the case of Mr. Jenkins with that of the Crown Prince of Austria at Serajevo. It wouldn't be fair, of course, but there would be something almost devilish in the parallel.

So, if we went into Mexico, we should have to be on our guard against most of the other nations of the world, and we should have to keep it up as long as we were in there. Doubtless we can "lick all creation," but the prospect of being ready to do so at all times for many years to come isn't altogether to our minds. We are good fighters, but we don't enjoy perpetual military discipline. It goes against the grain, and the cost is enormous.

Is there then no other solution of the difficulty? Why should all these other nations turn against us, when all we want is to protect our frontiers and the rights of our citizens? Does not the main source of the difficulty lie in our constituting ourselves judge, jury, and all the rest, in our own cause? Civilization got beyond that method with regard to individuals many centuries ago. It worked badly. Several centuries later it got beyond that method as between barons and other subordinate potentates. Now it has begun to look askance at it even between sovereign states. This was really one of the issues of the Great War, when we come to think of it. The fact that other nations did not like the way Austria proposed to settle her difficulties with Serbia, was what began the trouble, and the question was not altogether lost sight of up to the end. And it is we who have done much to bring the world to this conclusion. It is not only that we fought in France, but we have been pretty strenuous advocates of international arbitration for some time past.

Would it not then be well for us to obtain judgment, before we proceed to execution? "But the case is absolutely clear," will be the reply. Even so, a judgment from some one not directly interested would be of value. But the case is not altogether so clear in every respect, as we have seen. There is no doubt about the grievance, but there is grave doubt and difficulty about the application of the remedy. It is because of Mexico's very weakness that any application of force is so difficult a proceeding, and of this Mexico herself is well aware. If there were no alternative we must sooner or later brave all these troubles; but there is. The League of Nations has been constituted partly to meet just such circumstances. Its judgment would preclude interference and unfair condemnation of us on the part of other nations. It is conceivable that it might even bring home to the Mexicans a sense of the intolerable nature of their conduct, and it would at least warn them that they must not count on the sympathy of other nations if there is no improvement in the lot of foreigners in their country. The judgment of a court in which members of Latin nations took part would have weight with them. It is quite possible that means of some sort could be provided that would bring her to terms without the necessity of an American occupation.

A New French Periodical

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

We are on the point of carrying through a project which I have had at heart for some time. Our best-known writers, the most distinguished professors at the Sorbonne and even our more educated public men are anxious to see prevail in France one of the most necessary things among all free peoples—a true and thorough knowledge of foreign lands. In order to help bring this about, our plan is to found an organ which will instruct and address itself to the grand mass of the French public and to all those foreigners who read our language. For many years, too many in fact, our literary publications have, because of a sort of intellectual flaccidity—your late President Roosevelt would have called it mollycoddleness, I think—been taking no interest in trying to enlighten and instruct their readers. In these periodicals history, geography, customs, morals, laws, ideas are all ignored, and we are told nothing of the feelings and aspirations of other generations and other peoples. In a word, everything is neglected that has made and still makes the world about us, the result being that the France of to-day does not sufficiently understand anything beyond its own borders. Nor is this ignorance confined to my own countrymen. The discussions at the Peace Conference showed how poorly informed was even the intellectual and political élite of the present day in all parts of the globe. Consequently, it is the desire of the best minds of French university circles to create a review which will present in an entertaining and varied form, illuminating and attractive at one and the same time, the common results of universal erudition to a vast public which asks nothing better than to be instructed, provided it is done in a pleasing fashion. I may add that among our stockholders is a member of the French Academy as well as a great manufacturer, which shows how our idea appeals to various classes of our society.

The American Philological Association

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

The usual joint meeting of the American Philological Association and the Archaeological Institute of America will be held this year, December 29-31, at the University of Pittsburgh, and not at the University of Toronto as originally planned. A large gathering of representative college men, from both Canada and the United States, is expected. The Philological Association celebrates this year the fiftieth anniversary of its foundation, and a programme of unusual interest has been prepared to honor the occasion.

The Human Side of the Labor Problem

INDUSTRIAL GOODWILL. By John R. Commons. New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company.

THE writings of Professor Commons upon questions relating to labor always command attention. They do so for a variety of reasons, chief of which is an earnest desire of the author to clarify the discussion for the man in the street by presenting both the theory and the practice of the matter in as simple and direct a fashion as possible.

His latest book is no exception to the rule. There is nothing in it that the least gifted of intelligent persons can not understand. There is in it, also, a wealth of common sense and clear thinking.

The labor problem as it exists to-day may be discussed either from the point of view of the practical man who finds his evidence in actual experience or from the point of view of the theorist; a view that may be really more practical than that of the practical man, but nevertheless a view that is based upon a study of the problem in a detached, scientific way as an interested spectator rather than as an actual actor. Carnegie's "Triumphant Democracy" is an example of the first view; Commons's "Industrial Goodwill" of the second.

The first three chapters of "Industrial Goodwill" are devoted to an abbreviated but lucid discussion of the various theories respecting labor which have held sway in the United States since we became a manufacturing nation. There is the commodity theory, determined solely by demand and supply without reference to outside factors of any kind; there is the machinery theory in which labor is not a commodity—its value determined by demand and supply—but each laborer is a machine, the value of which is determined by the quantity of its product. This is the so-called scientific management theory, brought into such prominence a few years ago by Mr. F. W. Taylor. As Professor Commons points out, the commodity theory is the merchant's theory of buying and selling. The machinery theory is the engineer's theory of economy and output. Man is, after all, the most marvelous and productive of all forces of Nature. He is a mechanism of unknown possibilities. Treated as a commodity, he is finished and ready for sale. Treated as a machine, he is an operating organism to be economized. But is that all? To organize the needs of industry in accordance with either or both of these theories leaves to the laborer a bleak outlook of hazardous, unremitting toil such as even the most ignorant might refuse to tolerate. And it indicates to the employer that, having organized along the foregoing lines, nothing further need be expected in the way of reducing costs, cutting labor turnover, and avoiding the general dislocation of the business household when machine-made human nature suddenly reverts to type and starts smashing the industrial furniture. Now the trouble with both these theories is not that they are false but that they are incomplete. They do not tell the whole story. It is perfectly true that you can not alter absolutely the law of supply and demand. You can not afford nor do you care to give up the lower costs that come from improved machinery and economy of manual operation. But you can modify these laws and these theories so that they will fit not only the cases which you devise but a greater number of cases of which perhaps you have never thought. If you consistently underpay labor, if you always consider the worker as a machine fit for your endless number of time and motion experiments, you will make profits so long as no outside conditions arise. But such conditions often do arise. Prosperity comes, labor is in more demand and becomes correspondingly more aggressive. The cloud of grievances, unknown and unaccounted for in your scheme of things, finally settles down upon you. It bursts, and the strike deluge swirls through your labor ranks with devastating effect. When the storm is over you view the wreckage with amazement. Your theories collapse and all and more than all which has been gained in the days gone by is lost as a result of this sudden, mystifying behavior of your workers.

For what reason was this behavior so mystifying? Because the goodwill theory of labor had been overlooked. Practical-minded employers will be inclined to scoff at this theory. It is intangible, it operates unseen, it can not be cut, dried, measured and sold. Yet its force is greater than any other pertaining to labor and its wilful disregard hastens disaster with remarkable regularity. Why? Because the goodwill theory of labor is based upon a study of the motives and feelings of men. And there are no forces in human nature that react quicker upon men's actions than those forces which govern their instincts and their desires. Thwart them—and trouble begins to brew. Give them free play—those, of course, which are worthy—and hidden abilities of incalculable strength are loosened to come to your aid. So it is that the goodwill theory of labor assumes its position along with the commodity and machinery theory. It is not complete in itself. Neither are they. It supplements them and, with its aid as with their aid, we are enabled to meet the labor situation in a broader way, a more scientific way and ultimately, therefore, a more profitable way.

The problem of industrial goodwill is not alone concerned with the laborer. It is a matter of public importance as well. It permeates our whole social structure and touches the lives of each of us. Our national Government recognizes this fact, as shown by its creation of the Federal Trade Commission, a body organized to help eliminate unfair competition and thus safeguard commercial goodwill. State governments recognize it also by the passage of many goodwill measures, such as workmen's compensation, limiting the working hours for women, abolition of child labor. Legislation supplements goodwill and the goodwill of enlightened employers blazes the path for legislation.

This is, in brief, Professor Commons's explanation of the goodwill theory as it affects the laborer and the public. The rest of his book, excluding the last two chapters, is devoted to an explanation of goodwill as it affects the thoughts and acts of employers, and its practical application by them in their industrial relations.

For instance, if, as employers, we accept this theory, we immediately concern ourselves with the question of unemployment. Recognizing the value of a trained force we do everything possible to keep this force intact in bad times as well as good. We make an intensive study of the labor market and lend a hand towards helping any concerted movement that has for its aim the employment of the full labor resources of our community. In addition, we seriously consider and adopt, if possible, such beneficent plans as the insurance of our employees against the four great hazards of industry, death, disability, disease, and old age. We establish courses for our employees to make them better Americans and better workmen. We listen to their grievances and act upon them if they are just. We try to buy their loyalty and their enthusiasm, not by pretentious-looking, paternalistically endowed libraries and hospitals, but by genuine every-day fair play. In short, we treat them not as things, but as men.

There is one more step to be taken in discussing the goodwill theory. It is the way in which our nation itself is concerned in its application. To quote Professor Commons:

"No nation hereafter, not even America, can live to itself alone. America has come out of the war the one great industrial power of the world. Other nations are bankrupt. America is their creditor. America has the capital, the resources, the shipping, the man-power. America may use its power as Germany tried to do. It may subsidize its capitalists and trusts and make a science of dumping. It may make other nations eventually its enemies. Or it may submit its excessive power to be regulated in partnership and equality with other free nations. The struggles of the future are industrial. The world may be governed by supply and demand, and America will win by superior control over supply. Or the world may be governed in partnership and America will take an equal chance of winning in the face of international goodwill."

This book does not pretend to be an exhaustive treatise of the subject. It merely points the way. But in spite of its brevity it proves with conviction that goodwill in industry, as indeed in every other walk of life, is a factor of first magnitude. The religious maxim of "Peace on earth, goodwill to men" is not only good morals, it is good business. Nothing releases the surging forces that struggle for expression in each man's heart so effectively as the feeling that each separate bundle of cares, desires, and abilities are being properly recognized and dealt with. And a release of these forces into the proper channels, a study of the creative ability of each individual means more work, better work, loyalty and enthusiasm beyond measure.

The President's Methods at the Peace Conference

MR. BAKER has the distinction of outliving Colonel House in the intimacy of the President, being, at the close of the Peace Conference, the most eminent American who remained in his confidence. The American journalist, after Colonel House fell into disfavor, played repeatedly the part of Councillor of the President, as well as that of emissary from and to the American and other newspaper correspondents, and sometimes to and from statesmen.

Mr. Baker had a remarkable position: he was in charge of the American Press Bureau. He had access at all times to the American Delegation at their headquarters at the Hotel Crillon, and he visited the President once or twice a day. As one of the correspondents who dealt with Mr. Baker daily (I represented the New York Tribune), it gives me pleasure to record his eminent fairness and generosity. He and his assistant, Arthur Sweetser, never failed to treat the correspondents liberally. But while I hold Mr. Baker in high personal esteem, I can not regard his statement of the case of the Peace Conference as just.

For example, it is known that the Allied statesmen, after President Wilson left Paris to visit the United States for a month in February, were alarmed at the attitude of the Republican Senators, and persuaded Colonel House to agree to a preliminary treaty with Germany which excluded the League of Nations Covenant. Colonel House took the document and agreements down to Brest when he met President Wilson on March 13. After that day, the fact that Colonel House was no longer in the confidence of the President was fully realized in a certain inner circle in Paris. Mr. Baker says:

He (President Wilson) had been absent from the deliberations for exactly one month. When he arrived in Paris on March 14 he discovered to his amazement the impression everywhere prevailing that a preliminary peace with Germany would soon be made which would contain no reference to the League of Nations. Certain newspapers, and all the opponents of the League, were saying quite openly that the League was dead; for they well knew that if it were left for discussion to some future conference, after all the essential questions in the war with Germany had been settled, it would come to nothing; it would be talked to death. These opponents of the League were jubilant over the prospect.

When President Wilson found out what the situation really was he acted with stunning directness and audacity. On March 15, just twenty-four hours after he set foot in Paris, he authorized the press bureau of the Peace Conference, of which I was director, to issue at once the following statement:

"The President said to-day that the decision made at the Peace Conference in its Plenary Session January 25, 1919, to the effect that the establishment of a League of Nations should be made an integral part of the Treaty of Peace is of final force and that there is no basis whatever for the reports that a change in this decision was contemplated."

This bold act fell like a bombshell in Paris; and in Europe. A shot from Big Bertha could not have caused greater consternation.

Mr. Baker does not, can not, of course, give all the facts. He does not say that the President took this action apparently without consulting the Allied statesmen or even informing them, nor does he say that Colonel House was dropped because he came to sympathize with the points of view of many of the European diplomatists, against whom the President had determinedly set himself in his fight, as it was put, for his Fourteen Points.

Mr. Baker says nothing of the fact that scores of members of the President's Peace Commission, for one reason or another, turned against him and that at the conclusion of the Conference he had no man of the four he had personally selected as delegates who was willing or whom he would permit to remain in Paris as his representative. The President could not or would not delegate Colonel House, nor Mr. Lansing, nor Mr. White, nor General Bliss, but had to come back to America and send Mr. Polk to take his place—though he withheld authority from him to make serious decisions. It was a sorry situation when the formerly crowded Hotel Crillon was deserted by dozens at a time of the hundreds of men who had come to Paris six months earlier in the highest hopes. With radicals like Bullitt and conservatives like Lansing the situation was the same. Mr. Baker, obviously, could not put any of this information into "What Wilson Did at Paris," holding this, as he does, a great victory.

But in spite of his illness—and a terrible kind of aloneness, for it seemed at that time that everyone in the world was against him!—he would not give in. His physical illness seemed only to harden his determination. I went to see him the first day that he was up. I found him in his study, fully dressed, but looking thin and somewhat pale. A slight hollowness of the cheeks emphasized the extraordinary size and luminosity of his eyes. It was clear, from what he said, that a crisis had been reached, and that he was determined now to stop further delay and bring the questions in the Conference to a final issue. The Allies had agreed among themselves and agreed with Germany upon certain general principles of justice to be observed in the settlement, and the whole course of the Conference up to that time had been made up of a series of attempts to break over these agreements, to impose harder terms, get territory, levy impossible indemnities. The time had now arrived when there had to be a decision as between the two struggling purposes of the Conference.

He was very quiet in expressing his final decision, but gave an impression of unalterable determination. I felt, at the moment, that nothing but a supreme faith in Almighty God and in the rightness of his course, could have sustained him at that moment.

And when he has made up his mind, he can strike—as he did a number of times at Paris—with stunning boldness, audacity. On April 7 he acted—and the action fell like a thunderbolt. It was so unexpected, so challenging, so final, that half the newspapers would not at first believe it. He ordered the George Washington, which was then under repair at Brooklyn, to sail immediately for Brest. Our Press Bureau was directed to make the bare announcement without explanation. But no explanation was necessary; it was clear to everyone that the President had reached the extreme limit of his patience and that he was demanding a showdown. It was no bluff; either the settlement was to be on the principles laid down, or else he was prepared to sail for home.

And this statement symbolized a turning point in the Conference. There was an immediate toning down of the demands, and a new effort on every hand to get together. Above all, there was a marked change in the attitude of the press towards the President. His bold gesture had cleared the air, and from that moment forward the progress was much more rapid and decisive. A week later, on April 14, so advanced was the work on the Treaty that the Germans were summoned to Versailles.

From the final paragraph it would appear that the capitulations were made mostly by the Allies, but, as a matter of fact, they had come pretty nearly to the end of their concession-making, and it was really the President who made most, indeed a formidable series, of surrenders. The President and the American Delegation had tried for a long time to make it appear that he was the great new world knight-errant battling against cunning and selfish opponents. There was all too much of this, an amazing amount of it, given the correspondents daily. It was hoped and expected that when the President tacitly gave his ultimatum to Lloyd George and Clemenceau, they would capitulate and all America would rise behind the President. But neither of these things happened. Stocks did not fall in New York and, as one prominent paper stated editorially, the President couldn't expect America either to back him or repudiate his action, because America did not know what he was definitely contending for in the interpretation of his indefinite Fourteen Points.

Mr. Baker makes it appear that the loss of point one, "Open covenants openly arrived at," was due to the European practice of diplomacy behind closed doors. But there was no reason why the President, who the author correctly says was a tower of courage, should not have caused Mr. Baker to deal in complete confidence with the American press instead of doling out, as he says, capsules of information. And the President was even less considerate of Congress, which he had promised to keep informed. Mr. Baker attempts a hopeless task in trying to whitewash the President on "open diplomacy." Frequently Colonel House and Mr. Lansing did not know exactly what he was doing.

The book criticizes the French press and a part of the British (that which is not called "Liberal") for its veiled and unveiled attacks on the President. Mr. Baker appears to have forgotten the merciless attacks, in which he participated, that were daily launched, to the end of the President's stay, by most of the Americans against the French, the British, the Italians, and others. In one or two places in the book the work of the Germans is denounced. So it was at the Hotel Crillon—once in a while. Most of the time, however, one or other of the Allies, particularly the French, was the enemy of the towering representative of America and the new world order of things.

The book has apology in places for the failure of its hero to accomplish the full measure of his ideals. But consider what the situation in Europe would be to-day if Woodrow Wilson had succeeded in forcing his ideas on the hundred or more of the ablest statesmen in the world who were gathered there in Paris. There can be little doubt that the peace would have been a German and a Bolshevik peace. The blockade of Germany would have been lifted immediately, though it is still a necessary instrument in bringing Germany to terms. The President sought that on his first arrival in Paris. Germany would have been left intact if the President had had his way, and would have incorporated Austria, making the German "block" the largest national factor on the European Continent, especially menacing to France and Italy since the destruction of Russia as a military factor. Germany would have had a place at the peace conference had Mr. Wilson's desires prevailed, participating in the early discussions of the numerous settlements that had to be made.

He struggled to get the Bolsheviki recognized in fact, if indirectly, and to have negotiations started between the Allies and them—although on his return to this country he argued in various speeches in the West that unless the treaty was ratified promptly, Bolshevism would be a serious menace.

Mr. Baker speaks of the ceaseless labor of the President, who strove to get at the bottom of all questions, and of his numerous engagements and how he met all sorts of people. On one occasion, while on the same day having some twenty meetings and conferences, and composing a message to Congress, the President found time to receive two peasants from the frontiers of Poland, clad in sheepskins and distinctly odorous. Had the President's practices been fundamentally sound, he would never have attempted to perform such a mass of work himself, but would have chosen the ablest staff of assistants that America could produce, instead of an oddly mixed group with serious disagreements at its very top, between Colonel House and Mr. Lansing and the President, for example, and radical differences of view between its so-called Liberal elements and the serious-minded men of experience. On one occasion early in the peace negotiations at Paris, a leading English statesman, who seemed to have no doubt of the President's personal ambitions, said quite frankly, "We have enough of the President's dictations here in Paris and do not want to inflict ourselves with a perpetuation of them." A man willing to labor with, instead of against, experienced and honest diplomats (American and Allied), could have had a practical, effective league of nations now in operation; instead of which the whole international cause has certainly been seriously impaired by Mr. Wilson's personal methods.

The treaty which President Wilson brought back from Paris is by no means a Wilson peace. Most of the treaty is sound because able Europeans had a hand in its drafting. It was serious work those men had to perform—to bring Mr. Wilson to terms against his will: to risk antagonizing America, from whom their countries need so much assistance; and at the same time to lead their own people, through their newspapers, to skip lightly over the dangerous doctrines which the President and his agents (notably Mr. Creel) had sought to propagate. It was no mean work that they had to perform. But Mr. Baker gives them credit for scarcely anything but sinister, designing motives.

FREDERICK MOORE

"Troubles of Our Own"

ALL ROADS LEAD TO CALVARY. By Jerome K. Jerome. New York: Dodd, Mead & Company.

POLLY MASSON. By William H. Moore. New York: E. P. Dutton & Company.

THE unhandiest thing about the late slump in civilization is that all the troubles of the world seem suddenly to have become "troubles of our own." Our more ambitious fiction of the hour is trying to help us reckon what all these troubles come to, lumped together, and how we are to deal with them. We must, it is clear, be up and on our way, but whither?—in pursuit of what,—grail of faith, or star of personal destiny, or one's nose of self-interest, or cross of service, or banner of some new régime, or perfumed taper of aesthetic response?—or will-o'-wisp of sensualism?

Here are two sober and thoughtful attempts to see things as they are and have been and will be in these forcing years. "All Roads Lead to Calvary" is written in the mood of "The Passing of the Third Floor Back." But the earlier story sprang from the period of stagnant, yet uneasy calm which preceded the great storm. The note of it was, What are we, and what is going to happen to us, without Love? The note of the later story is, "What has happened to us, and how are we to rise from it, without Love?" . . . It is odd that though Mr. Jerome is older than the group or school of novelists whom we recognize as more than anything else "Wellsian," though he came into the Victorian world some years earlier than Mr. Wells himself, and found it a far more congenial place, he has gradually acquired the Wellsian or Georgian method. A chief trait of this method is that it produces the narrative as a sort of informal talk issuing, for our benefit, from the inner consciousness of the protagonist, who is theoretically not the author. The Britling book is one continuous emission of impressions; so, in its more trifling vein, was the Mr. Polly book, long since. So, with the girl Joan as recorder, is "All Roads Lead to Calvary." Our opening situation is purely Wellsian: the modern girl who has cut away from her stodgy, dissenting provincial household (Liverpool or thereabouts), and gained foothold as a journalist in London. She is Girton-equipped, of course; beautiful, intelligent, and with ears attuned to almost every zephyr of modernism. She plans to reform the world, falls in love with a married man, plays suffragette, says farewell to love;

"carries on." . . . We can see Messrs. Wells and Company dealing with these materials. Joan would promptly and almost carelessly come to terms of physical mating with her man. After a while the connection might prove worth eloping for, or might cease to seem of any particular importance, and thus quietly lapse with no harm done to either party or his wife. Mr. Jerome does not "see it that way." He has a very different idea of what a Joan is. It does not occur as necessary to create either a Woman or a God in his own image, in order to feel at home with them. He has no special scunner against marriage or other sacraments. He does not see the world saved by theory or law or the most ingenious and latest of specifics with the Wellsian trademark. He is, we confess, reactionary and sentimental; and as well content to make the breast swell with human kindness and the eye dim with pity as ever was the absurd and deathless caricaturist Dickens, or the notorious sentimentalist Thackeray.

However, like the other novel before us, it is chiefly interesting as a story which in some degree embodies the spectacle of our time. Through Joan's eyes we behold the confusion and hysteria and manifold "unrest" that prefaced the war; madness of self-seeking and madness of world-propaganda:

They were to be found on every corner: the reformers who could not reform themselves. The believers in universal brotherhood who hated half the people. The denouncers of tyranny demanding lamp-posts for their opponents. The bloodthirsty preachers of peace. The moralists who had persuaded themselves that every wrong was justified provided they were fighting for the right. The deaf shouters of justice. . . .

This Joan is, after all, safe in the confusion, with her old-fashioned amulets of conscience and right feeling. She remains clean of body and soul, she suffers and serves; and her journey is not in vain: "The road to Calvary! It was the road to life. By the giving up of self we gained God."

The meretricious feature of "Polly Masson" is its title. The book is clumsy and inert in so far as its "heart interest" is concerned, and very much alive in other respects. Polly herself is hardly more than a suggestive sketch of a recognizable type. We don't quite believe in the part she is supposed to play in the development of the action. That action is slight and loose-knit, despite the author's evident wish to concede his readers their due commodity of "plot." But many of the people in the book and all the ideas are singularly alive. The egregious Benjamin Body with his schemes for world-domination by the "Anglo-Saxon" may be a fantastic and almost farcical figure. But Larned is a credible and interesting person in himself, as well as an illuminating commentator.

The most salient and not the least influential figure upon the scene, however, is the "Man With the Sponge," the old farmer, whom, with Larned, we meet but once as if by chance, on a train, but who is more genuinely than Polly Masson an awakening influence for Larned. Throughout the book we feel the spirit of the old enthusiast hovering, and not in vain.

The time is supposed to be the near future, with the war well behind, and the special disturbances following the war safely weathered. Nationalism still exists, old issues of private rights and public welfare are still being fought out, the no-race, no-class millennium is still appreciably beyond the horizon. In Canada, our immediate scene, the old antagonisms of farmer and manufacturer, of capital and labor, of the two racial stocks, of the national and the imperial ideas, are still unadjusted. In Larned's conversion from the rôle of practical politician, rising steadily on the tide of personal and party advancement, to that of humble and honest seeker for truth and justice, we see a hopeful omen. His star has set as a figure of public authority and power, but his day of real service has dawned. To two special causes he has given his allegiance, the rights of the French-Canadian, and the rights of the farmer. He is convinced also of the beneficent uses of capital, of the competitive system, and of free trade.

And as the basis of his creed he has adopted the article urged upon him by the old "Man with the Sponge": that the State is sick under the politicians' inoculations of privilege. Special privileges cast as sops to capital, or labor, or agriculture, are alike breeders of disease. Especially deadly to the workers on the land are the special privileges wrested from the State by organized labor; yet upon the land all stable society must rest. The matter is summed up in Larned's reply to the deputation of strikers who are threatening to paralyze industry if their arbitrary demands for privilege are not at once granted by the Government:

The hundred-acre farm is the foundation of all our industry. You of the shop cannot compete with the men of the shop elsewhere. At present, fully thirty per cent of your wages is not earned out of your product; it is contributed by men in unprotected industries under laws passed in the belief that diversified industry is in the general interest of the State. But is any Government justified in compelling men who work ten hours and twelve hours a day to hand over a part of their earnings to men who refuse to work more than eight hours a day?

A pregnant question, surely, for the radical American of our own latitude and period to answer for himself, in all candor.

MR. PUNCH'S History of the Great War" (Stokes) contains 170 cartoons and the best occasional verse and prose from the war issues. Of the British spirit this is a significant document. There could be no more resolute and successful endeavor to smile down grief and care. In morale Punch must have been a potent factor. Bernard Partidge maintains the tradition of the serious political cartoon with distinction. "Ghosts at Versailles" is worthy of Tenniel himself. For the more intimate humors of the struggle Raven Hill is an admirable interpreter. Bateman, relatively a newcomer, is capital in burlesque and fertile in invention. Nothing better shows the imperturbability of Mr. Punch than that the intervention of the United States passes almost unnoticed. Britain had grown too used to doing for herself to waste words on a new ally. It is precisely the absence of the international mind, a pretty cheap commodity at present, which makes this album refreshing. It will be doing an intelligent guest a good turn to put it on the guest-room table.

"When I Come Back" (Houghton Mifflin) is the brief record of the military life of a young American soldier, a lawyer of infirm physique, sensitive appetite and shrinking habits, who, after a few months of arduous drill and a few weeks of manly service, died from the sliver of a flying shell on November 1 in the Argonne. The story is quiet and the man taciturn, and it requires some art and a great deal of feeling on the part of Henry Sydnor Harrison, the narrator, to make this opacity transparent and this silence articulate. Mr. Harrison, whose command of English and of better things than English is unquestionable, has done his work with an art which can not hide his tenderness, and which his tenderness veils but does not hide. One would like to have been the author of such a book; one would like to have been its theme.

Stories of this kind are valuable to us at the present moment; they rescue the war. We have seen what negotiators and Prime Ministers and Senators have made of the fruits of other men's unstinted sacrifice; it is good to get back to the simple valor of the trenches. What would the knapsack have thought of the green bag? The question is not one to be hastily or rashly answered. Perhaps men like this young lawyer, who faced the terrors of the work without flinching, would have faced with serenity the imperfections of the result. The deductions which human nature is sure to make from the just rewards of sacrifice are one of the things by which sacrifice is intensified and ennobled. We pay twice for liberty. We pay in blood at Yorktown and Gettysburg, at Château-Thierry and St. Mihiel. We pay in futilities, procrastinations, relapses, and bickerings at the conferences of diplomats and the sessions of Legislatures. After all, what choice have we? What if the price paid on the Meuse and in the Argonne be terrible, if the price paid on the Quai d'Orsay and in the Senate chamber be ignominious? Liberty is worth them both.

Mr. Frederick Fairchild Sherman's eight essays in "American Painters of Yesterday and To-day" are an agreeable by-product of his editorship of Art in America. Mr. Sherman is not an analytical, hence not a very penetrating critic, but he has the grace of good taste and trained enthusiasm. In particular he has a knack in the choice of a subject, and often brings out neglected aspects of his themes which are worth while. He treats, for example, the delightful miniature landscapes by Francis Murphy and Winslow Homer's early figure pieces which have a quality of color often lacking in his marines. A sketch of Dwight Tryon carries one from the Cazin-like solidity of his beginnings to his later evanescent style. George Fuller, Wyatt Eaton, Arthur B. Davies, Harry W. Watrous, and the patriarch Benjamin West are similarly hit off with brevity and discretion. The book is fastidiously made at Mr. Sherman's own press, has thirty-one colotype illustrations, and the edition is limited to five hundred copies.

A believer in reincarnation and multiple personality might well imagine that the souls of Nietzsche, Ignatius Donnelly, and the evangelist Moody had formed an entente cordiale in the person of Mr. Snell Smith, the author of "America's Tomorrow" (Britton Publishing Company). Mr. Smith sets up a theory of mechanical expansion for nations. After just three hundred years of preparation, every great power will have reached an ambition which can only be satisfied by conquest. Its dominion will reach to precisely three hundred years when it in turn will give way to the next. This is a providential process which can be proved out of history. America's climax will come in 1938. If shortly thereafter she manages to create a world state, internationally governed, she may avoid her otherwise inevitable decline. All this is demonstrated out of the book of "Revelations," by skilful inference from "the number of the east," etc. Amateurs of this sort of prophecy and cosmology will doubtless find the book stimulating. To doubters it will merely seem raw and extravagant.

The Established Church of England

IT is difficult to turn from the absorbing political and economical events of the day to the less urgent subject of the Established Church of England. Yet, if one would keep in view the entire field of contemporary English life one must—for the moment, at any rate—include in a survey, however cursory, certain suggestive movements in the Established Church. To put it shortly, there is now before Parliament a measure popularly termed the Enabling Bill. Before these notes are printed it may have become a statute, for it has already passed the House of Lords, and it has been read a second time in the House of Commons. The object of this legislation is to establish a representative Church Assembly, and also some smaller local bodies. To the first is transferred many of the powers of Parliament itself in relation to the Church of England. Those who are in favor of the Bill urge that the change will increase the efficiency of the Church of England as an organization, those who are opposed to it regard it as the beginning of the separation of Church and State—a dangerous, from their point of view, thin end of a wedge. Be that as it may, one thing is clear; that the proposed enactment is a clear recognition by the Church of its own present inefficiency as an organized body, a fact which has been clear for a long time to impartial observers. That it has been out of touch with national feeling has also been apparent, never more so than during the Great War. But this Bill, though it may improve organization, is in no sense an attempt by the Church to enlarge its influence as a spiritual force. The hostility of great numbers of the English people to the Established Church, which was a noticeable feature of much of the Victorian age, has almost disappeared.

In this survey one should not omit to notice that the change has occurred, chiefly, because the Church of England has now but little share in the elementary education of the country, whether in towns or rural districts, whilst at Oxford and Cambridge its influence is very slight. Nonconformist grievances, whether in regard to elementary schools or the ancient universities, have been remedied, with a consequent decrease in the influence of the Established Church. If the Church is no longer attacked it is also no longer defended. The Oxford movement has become only an historical event, and the tendencies of the High Church party towards Romanism no longer drive many good people into a panic nor produce bitter religious strife. Evolution which was so disturbing a factor in the last century is accepted as something almost commonplace and only stimulates ingenious preachers to show how it can be reconciled with revealed religion. The Established Church thus exists to-day tolerated good-naturedly by the nation as a whole, which maintains that it performs useful social and moral functions, and regards it as part of the English polity just as the ancient cathedral and the mediæval parish church is a feature of the English landscape.

The truth is that a national Established Church is a complete anachronism. The Church of England has had its day and can not be resuscitated as a national Church. It is, if we regard it from the point of view of the work it does and of its religious influence, already disestablished in fact. Bishops and other high ecclesiastical functionaries are appointed by the Crown. No one objects because the practice hurts no one. It is not yet disestablished because for the most part its revenues are provided by owners of land only and so to the great mass of the nation its maintenance is no financial burden. If those revenues were diverted from the Church they would be transferred to other public purposes, so that those who support the Church compulsorily have no practical reason to agitate for a change. It remains in relation to the national welfare a minor beneficent force, to-day characterized by the lack of enthusiasm which was so remarkable in the eighteenth century. It produces no great divines, such as Warburton and his predecessors of the seventeenth century, who, whatever might be the value of their forcibly expressed opinions, gave an intellectual lustre to the Established Church. Nor has it the simple emotionalism which is the chief support of the Nonconformist Churches, nor the simple-minded and unquestioning devotion of the Roman Catholic Church to its faith and to its purpose. The Church of England appeals now, whole-heartedly, neither to reason or feeling; it has neither an intellectual nor an emotional influence.

The system which is created by the Enabling Bill may possibly make the Church, as an organization, more efficient, but by removing Church legislation from Parliament, it greatly weakens, if it does not unknowingly destroy, the nexus which binds together Church and State, and it makes of the Established Church a body more sectarian and less national. It is pretty obvious that if the Established Church becomes narrower and more sectarian, yet retains advantages, financial and social, from a connection with the State, it may under these circumstances arouse the resentment of unendowed religious bodies and the hostility of those who would regard its resources as better employed for secular purposes.

IN "Cæsar's Wife," in which Miss Billie Burke is now starring at the Liberty Theatre, Mr. Somerset Maugham has moved from London to Cairo. He has likewise made a second migration—from fashionable cynicism to emotional interest. There is a great deal of London in his Cairo, and there is a great deal of fashionable cynicism in his emotional play. The smartness, impartially divided between the gowns and the repar-tees, is all that one could wish. Indeed, the Maughamisms, if I may coin a word for those pleasantries which resemble scimitars in their brightness, their sharpness, and the symmetry of their expanding curves, are almost exceptional in their goodness. It is to the serious and pathetic Mr. Maugham that the spectator is troubled to adjust himself.

Sir Arthur Little, a ripe diplomatist, brings to the British consular agency in Cairo a very young and very recent wife. He has a young secretary, and youth beckons to youth. The story is simple. The wife is open; the husband is considerate; the lover is fickle, and the wife, who has sinned only in heart, is cured, or convalescent, as the curtain falls. One goes away quite out of patience with the ridiculous fuss that is made over these small embarrassments in common plays and common life. Husbands are so rarely diplomatists.

The suitor-husband is often irresistible. He charmed us, a little wag-gishly, in Sardou's and de Najac's "Divorçons," more gravely in Augier's "Gabrielle." But Sir Arthur Little is too magnanimous to be charming—to be even tolerable. The Foreign Office is recalling the young secretary to Paris; Sir Arthur obtains a revocation of this order. The motive is patriotic. When people like Mr. Maugham, to whom human nature appears brittle or base, attempt to make it sublime, they make it inhuman. Sir Arthur can rise still further. He says to his wife: "I want you to look on your love as a thing of beauty." This is too much. It may be gentlemanly in husbands to release, to pardon, to compassionate their wives, but the husband who slobbers over his wife's passion for somebody else is reptilian. The animal may exist; the human "Zoo" is extensive; but, if existent, I venture to say that he is not a Briton with twenty years of diplomatic triumphs in the consular service at his back.

The wife, Violet, is a nestling creature, and the closing scene, in which she sinks back with half affectionate, half indifferent, placidity into her husband's arms, is pretty enough. After all, why not the husband? Men to Violet are mostly cushions, and the difference in cushions, though appreciable, is not heart-breaking. The Violet whom Mr. Somerset Maugham presented to Miss Billie Burke was an attenuated creature, and the attenuation was carried still further in the Violet whom Miss Billie Burke handed over to the audience. It was impossible to be angry with a young person whose attitude toward her own oversight (it seemed hardly more) was so prettily regretful. Mr. Norman Trevor as Sir Arthur Little showed us the British oak—not to say the American pine—in a native sturdiness which diplomacy had failed to plane or varnish. In this simplified version of his part he was agreeable, and perhaps it was not amiss that the character should receive back as a gift from Mr. Trevor a part of the manliness of which it had been unfairly despoiled by Mr. Maugham. The only break in the symmetry of a rounded performance was the part of the young secretary. There are persons who have more power than the moral law itself to make adultery inexcusable. The actor of Roland Parry belonged, for the moment, to that class.

The scenery was magnificent. There were two electrical moments when the dull-orange panes of the two windows were successively drawn aside, and the glories and rarities of Egypt, as Mr. Joseph Urban dared to picture them, invaded and possessed the scene. Ruskin, in the opening of the "Stones of Venice," contemplating the city's image in the mirage of the lagoon, declared that it was hard to tell which was the city and which was the shadow. At the Liberty Theatre, with Mr. Urban, not only beautiful, but movingly dramatic, in his scenery, and Miss Billie Burke so purely decorative in the enactment of the heroine, it was difficult to tell which was the setting and which was the play.

ONE Saturday evening of last month, the "Queen's Enemies," by Lord Dunsany, and a "Sunny Morning," by Serafin and Joaquin Alvarez-Quintero, were given by the Neighborhood Players, at their playhouse on Grand Street. The point in the "Queen's Enemies," a one-act Oriental play, appears to be the union in the same character of the infantile and the ferocious—a combination which, however remote from nature and adverse to beauty, undoubtedly has point. The queen invites her enemies to dine with her in a subterranean vault in Egypt; she beguiles them with saavities and puerilities and whimperings until the moment when her command closes the doors and opens the sluices, and buries her victims under the inrushing waters of the Nile. A dinner in a vault is an actual and serious discomfort to the imagination, and nothing could obviate this effect but a dignity and impressiveness in the setting which the Neighborhood Players, very naturally and excusably, were unable to supply. They were much more successful in the presentation of the little Spanish play, a "Sunny Morning," in which two aged lovers, long since separated, meet each other by chance in a park in Madrid. It is one of the bitter-sweet plays—a cup with syrup on the top for the thoughtless, and aloes at the bottom for those whom life has taught and disillusioned. The acting was good. Miss Alice Lewisohn, who in the unnatural part of the queen hardly got beyond a querulous and stilted palaver, appeared to real advantage in Dona Laura.

"Salome" and "Monsieur Beaucaire"

AMERICAN composers need encouragement. And one of them, at least, seems to be getting it at last from his own countrymen. The happy exception to a rule which has obtained too long is Henry Hadley, whose "Cleopatra" will be heard, some time this season, at the Metropolitan, and whose "Salome" was performed the other day by the New Symphony Orchestra.

Just why this composer should be favored as he is, I do not know. Mr. Hadley has undoubtedly much talent. But there are others who can boast of even more. For instance, Charles M. Loeffler, a musician of the very highest rank, who, up till now, has failed to break into the opera field. There is a tide, though, in the affairs of men. And Mr. Hadley somehow has not missed it.

As a conductor, Mr. Hadley has his failings. He hardly leads—he follows—his musicians. But this does not detract much from the interest of his setting of "Salome." He wrote that tone-poem, it appears, at Munich some months before or after the production of the work of the same name by Richard Strauss. Before this there had been two other efforts—indeed, three—in France, to set music to the story briefly first told in Holy Writ, and later on retold (with strange "embellishments") by Oscar Wilde.

In his "Hérodiade," as we know, Jules Massenet (who abhorred the name of Jules) had dealt with Salome. The libretto of "Hérodiade," however, had only a vague relationship to the original narrative of the Evangelist. At the beginning of this century, again, a French naval officer named Mariotte—or was it Marriotte?—produced an effective, and in some passages most expressive, "Sa-

The "Perfected Motor"

The initial product (1888) of the Crocker-Wheeler Company was the "Perfected Motor."

A large electrical company using the "Perfected Motor" placed a tag stating that they approved of this motor.

lome," which, strange to say, though in a crude and tentative way, may have suggested much to Richard Strauss. I heard it a few years ago in Paris, at the Gaité-Lyrique, where it was often sung. And, earlier still, a tragic pantomime, with a scenario by the late Armand Silvestre and—myself, had been set to music by the composer Gabriel Pierné, and played with some success at the theatre now known as the Athénée, with Loie Fuller in the character of the "heroine."

Mr. Hadley's able arrangement of the story, in symphonic form, is often eloquent enough to dispense with words and to evoke hot Eastern pictures without scenery. It could not, to be sure, be called a masterpiece. Nor would the American's best friends be well-advised if they provoked comparisons. But, as a suggestion of the languorous, lustful drama of the Irish poet, it serves its purpose. The famous "Dance of the Seven Veils" is scored with skill. It has voluptuous charm and not a little fancy. Moreover, in this tone-poem we are spared the atrocious horror of that final episode which, in the days of Mr. Heinrich Conried's management, caused the expulsion of "Salome" from the Metropolitan.

Since Strauss and Henry Hadley wrote their works, two more "Salomes" have been heard, here and abroad—one the much-talked-of "Vision of Salome," in which Maud Allen made such a sensation in London, and the other, Florent Schmitt's symphonic drama.

To most Broadway music-lovers, tone-poems and symphonies appeal less potently than light operas. For one man or one woman in New York who heard "Salome" played by the New Symphony Orchestra, twenty will have been drawn to the New Amsterdam by the new operetta—styled on the bills "romantic opera" of André Messager.

The name of this engaging work itself attracts. "Monsieur Beaucaire." It recalls to us the short story of Booth Tarkington and the successful little play which was produced here with so much success by Mansfield. The name of Mr. Messager is also a real asset. The composer has a well-earned reputation, due to two earlier light operas from his pen, his "La Basoche" and "Véronique." The latter of them has been long forgotten by most New York playgoers. But it will shortly be revived in Paris at the Opéra mique, of which Mr. Messager is now, the second time, the musical director. The libretto which Frederick Lonsdale hewn out of the novel of Booth Tarkington might be improved on. It interested me less than several very pretty operettas by Adrian Ross which grace that book. In this operetta (for it is really an operetta, and not an opera, as it has been on the French stage it might rank as an opera comique), much that amused us in the play and in the book has of necessity been omitted. We hear some reference now, and then to the French barber who shaved fops and wits in Bath. But it is not as what was once called a tonsorial artist, but as the keeper of a select gambling house, that the disguised Prince is introduced to us in the Prologue—and, exposition—by the librettist. In his gambling house, Monsieur Beaucaire reveals his love for his "red English rose," the Lady Mary, and traps the villainous Duke of Winterset, his rival. In the first act Monsieur Beaucaire, masquerading as the Duc de Château-Rien, is presented to her ladyship and fights a duel. In the second, and by far the most impressive, of the three—or, counting the Prologue, the four—episodes in the story, he is denounced by Winterset and attacked by his accomplices. While in the third and last act he resumes his proper dignity and discomfits his enemies.

There are touches, here and there, of humor and sentiment in the dialogue, and once or twice we have a flash of wit. The most admirable feature of the libretto, beyond doubt, is the finale of the second act—in which the supposed (and now exposed) "Monsieur Beaucaire" sinks back, supported by his friends, and the red rose which has been given him by his sweetheart is dyed doubly red in his warm blood. That incident to some will seem more worthy of the French composer's talent than the preceding scenes. It charms one by its genuine grace and art.

It seems a pity that, to suit the taste of London (for which "Monsieur Beaucaire" was written), Mr. Messager should have allowed himself to be beguiled into occasional efforts to repeat Sir Arthur Sullivan. His French art does not suit the English style. And it rather pained (as well as startled some of us) to catch echoes, as it were, of more than one of Sir Arthur's ditties in his music.

There are various light and graceful airs and duos, trios and ensembles, in the score of "Monsieur Beaucaire." "The Red Rose" song should surely please the general. So may some other numbers.

But if "Monsieur Beaucaire" should make a hit here, as it did in London, it will be thanks less to the dainty though not very striking music of Mr. Messager, and its interpretation by the principals in the cast, than to the setting of the work, the delightful costumes of the beaux and belles of Bath, and the stage pictures, which have been provided by the producers. For these and other things we are indebted to Mr. Gilbert Miller and to Mr. Erlanger.

The chief characters in the operetta are entrusted to Marion Greene (Monsieur Beaucaire), Mr. Robert Parker (the Duke of Winterset), Mr. Lennox

Pawle (Frederick Bantison), Mr. Robert Cunningham (Beau Nash), Marjorie Burgess (Lucy) and Blanche Tomlin (Lady Mary). In London Maggie Teyte appeared as the heroine.

Books and the News

English Books of 1919

SUPPLEMENTING other lists which have appeared in this place, and considering suitability as gifts, the following books are named. They are by English or Irish writers, are of the present year, most of them are inexpensive, and all should be easily obtainable before Christmas, in view of the fact that they come from American publishing houses.

For the novels, the lover of Dickens may like Sir Harry Johnston's "The Gay-Donbeys" (Macmillan), but he who cares for a story of English politics and society is almost sure to enjoy it. Compton Mackenzie's "Sylvia and Michael" (Harper) appeals primarily to readers interested in a certain set of characters, but should interest almost anyone for its curious picture of life in the Balkan states during the war. Lovers of Conrad need only the mention of "The Arrow of Gold" (Doubleday), just as the name of William De Morgan is to many persons enough recommendation for his "The Old Madhouse" (Holt). May Sinclair's "Mary Olivier" (Macmillan) is highly praised. Hugh Walpole's "Jeremy" (Doran) is an admirable story of a little boy, while Aumonier's "The Querrils" (Century) contains both incident and psychological study, more successfully balanced than is usual in the average novel. Three novels of adventure are: Stacpoole's "The Beach of Dreams" (Lane), Anthony Hope's "The Secret of the Tower" (Appleton) and Oppenheim's "The Box With Broken Seals" (Little).

For a few important books about the war, Viscount French's "1914" (Houghton) is partly controversial, but wholly interesting. G. M. Trevelyan writes "Scenes From Italy's War" (Houghton) and Lord Dunsany is the author of some sketches called "Unhappy Far Off Things" (Little). General Sir Frederick Maurice's "The Last Four Months: How the War Was Won" (Little), with its splendid tributes to America's fighting achievement, is good reading for every American, and should be prescribed for malignant England-haters, of whatever nation. The lighter side of the war is excellently treated in "Mr. Punch's History of the Great War" (Stokes), in which the illustrations are the chief feature. In the same field is "A Last Diary of the Great War" (Lane), by "Saml. Pepys, Jr." Ian Hay's "The Last Million" (Houghton) is another appreciation of America's army. Mrs. Humphry Ward, in "Fields of Victory" (Scribner) continues her writings on this subject.

Undoubtedly, the most amusing English book of the year is Daisy Ashford's "The Young Visitors" (Doran), which skeptics of the never-say-die breed still attribute to Sir James Barrie. Another humorous book is Garstin's "The Mud Larks" (Doran), stories of the trenches, originally printed in Punch. Readers little addicted to hunting have thoroughly enjoyed Masefield's "Reynard the Fox" (Macmillan), a ballad of the chase, but I am rather less at sea on a ship than on a horse, and would choose Miss C. Fox Smith's rattling nautical poems, in "Sailor Town" (Doran). New York has seen, this week, Drinkwater's "Abraham Lincoln; a Play" (Houghton). Other dramatic works are Pinero's "Social Plays" (Dutton), Shaw's "Heart-break House" (Brentano), and Gordon Craig's "The Theatre Advancing" (Little).

Ralph Nevill's "Life and Letters of Lady Dorothy Nevill" (Dutton) could not fail to be enjoyable, especially if it resulted in sending any reader, who has not had that pleasure, to Lady Dorothy's own books. If the essays in "Leaves in the Wind" (Dutton) are equal to Mr. H. M. Brock's illustrations for them, then the author, "Alpha of the Plough," is one of England's most brilliant essayists. "The Book of a Naturalist" (Doran), by W. H. Hudson, is varied and pleasing. Sir George Younghusband relates many historical romances in "The Tower of London From Within" (Doran).

Christmas Is Upon You

IN these days of high prices you will find no similar expenditure which will bring more satisfaction than a REVIEW subscription. Among the many reasons for this selection consider six:

1. You can easily procure this gift even if you have delayed until "the last minute."
2. Your friends will thank you for introducing them to THE REVIEW.
3. The fact that your friends will also be reading THE REVIEW will give you another common interest.
4. A gift of THE REVIEW means not one, but fifty-two remembrances.
5. The purchase of THE REVIEW is not ill-advised spending, such as Christmas often precipitates.
6. Many persons consider that, during the present intellectual stampede, it is a public service to support this journal.

The Counting Room

Readers of THE REVIEW are aware that its editorial policies are continuous:

(a) Nearly every issue has contained authoritative matter in regard to conditions in Russia, the political disease centre of the world;

(b) The fundamentals of current American politics are considered every week;

(c) A series of articles written by a woman indicate to the woman voter her new and great responsibilities and opportunities for service.

(d) The subject of music is regularly treated by an authority.

(e) THE REVIEW continues to promote constructive measures instead of destructive experiments; and in response to a public demand, exposes the false positions of its radical contemporaries.

(f) The underlying problems of finance are the subject of important articles.

Books, old and new, on timely topics are listed every week by Mr. Pearson of the New York Public Library. In this department he has given valuable bibliographies on the following subjects: Strikes, Mexico, China, Treaties, Crime, Foreign Visitors, American Government, Prohibition, Armenia, Reference Books, Ireland, The Industrial Problem, Children's Books, Gift Books. Single copies of THE REVIEW containing these lists are available.

These are among the strands woven into the fibre of THE REVIEW as it comes from the press each week.

Bringing the World into the Classroom

The desire to link teaching with current events—to bring the outside world into the classroom—is the mark of the modern educator. The Department of English, Wellesley; the Department of History, Haverford; the Department of English, University of North Carolina; Department of Political Science, Western Reserve University; Department of English, University of Wisconsin; Department of Higher Journalism, University of South California; and Department of English, Vassar; are among the progressive educational organizations which are prescribing the reading of THE REVIEW by their students.

James Main Dixon, Professor of Higher Journalism, University of Southern California, makes this statement:

"My reasons for using THE REVIEW as a 'required' in the class I conduct in the Higher Journalism, is the need I recognize for a capable weekly digest of the political and literary situation. . . . Careful paragraphs, summing up the situation, well-balanced leading articles, just and incisive reviews; such matter, read steadily, from week to week, makes the very best kind of training."

IT is welcome news, if true, that General Wood intends to resign from the army at an early date. It had apparently been his intention to retain his commission until the choice of the Republican National Convention for President had been made. But this is no time for the American people to buy a pig in a poke. General Wood's record as an administrator in Cuba, and the dominant part he played in organizing our preparedness for participation in the Great War, constitute a definite and substantial basis for his aspiration to the Presidency. His association in the public mind with action at once vigorous and restrained in meeting conditions of internal disturbance is another legitimate factor in his campaign. But the issues of the time are too large, and the influence of the Chief Executive in dealing with them is too overwhelmingly important, to permit mere conjecture as to any candidate's attitude towards them to take the place of knowledge. This does not mean, of course, that a candidate should state exactly what his course would be in regard to each particular problem, or even each problem of the first importance. But some opportunity to take his measure as a statesman, and to judge of the spirit in which he would deal with the main issues that will confront the country, is essential to the formation of an intelligent public estimate of any candidate. Such opportunity General Wood can not furnish so long as he holds a commission in the Army. With that restraint removed, it is to be hoped that he will satisfy every reasonable requirement in this regard.

CONSPIRACY to violate the draft act by urging men to refuse to register, and three other violations of laws enacted for the successful conduct of the war, were the acts charged against the 27 I. W. W. plotters convicted and sentenced the other day at Kansas City. A more shocking example of the evils of the law's delay can hardly be conceived. The penalties imposed upon these men are no doubt the just consequence of their acts; and no one can say how vitally the success of the draft, for instance, may have depended upon the knowledge that such punishment would be imposed. But there is something ghastly about the judgment being pronounced some two years after the commission of the offense, and at a time when the draft itself has almost been forgotten. Thousands of people who would have recognized the action of the law as both just and necessary had it taken place at its natural time are now confused in their minds, and divided in their feelings, when they read the news. Court and jury at Kansas City have doubtless done their simple duty; but their act has been robbed of nine-tenths of its efficacy. What defect is it in our national make-up that prevents us from administering the criminal law with that promptness which is as essential to its proper working as is justice itself?

HARVEY'S WEEKLY makes definite and serious charges of misconduct against Norman Hapgood, our Minister to Denmark. Their truth or falsehood ought to be established beyond doubt, and this at the earliest possible moment. In the meanwhile, without passing any judgment upon them, it is not amiss to note with approval what his predecessor, Mr. Egan, says on the subject of Hapgood's appointment. Minister Egan "can not believe it possible that any diplomatic officer of America" could have acted as Mr. Hapgood is charged with having done; but he states that at the time of the appointment he advised Hapgood not to accept it "for two important reasons": First, because "he was unprepared by experience and training" for diplomatic duties which at this time are of peculiar delicacy, and secondly, because his chief object, of which he made no secret, in accepting the post, was "to make a careful study of Bolshevism, believing that Lenin and Trotsky were grossly misrepresented in this country and that he wanted to correct the prevailing American impression of the Russian radicals." From any point of view, the President's choice was a queer one; in the light of what Mr. Egan says, it appears to have been even more clearly improper than it was on its face.

IT is not likely that many were misled by the charge that the deplorable disorders of last October in Phillips County, Arkansas, were due to an organized negro plot of extermination against the whites. It was abundantly proved, during the period of slavery, that the negro population of the South does not furnish promising soil for deeply laid plotting. In a recent number of the Nation, Walter F. White, of the Association for the Advancement of Colored People, throws some light on the Phillips County situation, though the facts concerning the actual outbreak of violence are still uncertain. Mr. White, we think, successfully defends the Phillips County "Progressive Farmers and Household Union" against the charge of being a seditious organization. It was duly chartered under the laws of Arkansas, with the special purpose of securing protection to negro tenant farmers against abuses of the "share-cropping" system, combined with the furnishing of supplies to the tenant on credit, through some designated agent of the landowner. The shameless robbery of tenants under this system, by unscrupulous landlords, has been acknowledged and severely condemned by representative newspapers of the South, and it is to be hoped that public opinion will force the Governor and Legislature of the State to devise some adequate means by which the evil may be controlled.

THERE is nothing epoch-making in Mr. F. H. La Guardia's appointment of a woman to serve as his secretary; the Presidents of the New York Board of Aldermen have had women secretaries before. But the appointment of a woman like Miss Charlotte Delafield, who could be a woman of leisure if she chose to be, but who has instead equipped herself by hard work to be a highly useful public servant, is a good example of the special kind of service which the woman citizen can give. Miss Delafield does not take the office for its modest salary, but she would be either more or less than human if she did not receive it with a sense of deep satisfaction at having herself done a good job, and at having given to the community more than it would otherwise be in a position to buy.

THE struggles of New York City over its projected new courthouse make a long and depressing story, but the latest turn in it involves a matter of principle that may be said to be of national interest. Upon the plea that further delay would be intolerable, it has been contrived—or at least it is sought to be contrived—that the Art Commission of New York shall have no opportunity to pass upon the plan recently selected. Not only in New York, but in our cities generally, the power of the Art Commission to veto undesirable architectural or decorative projects has in the last twenty years been of inestimable value. In the present instance, there seems to be no reason to suppose that the Commission would object to the plan, or that its examination of it would cause any appreciable delay. If the plan is unobjectionable, as there is every reason to suppose it to be, the Commission would doubtless promptly make a favorable report; if it is objectionable, the public ought to have a chance to be informed of this by the body which has so often stood its protector against both errors and waste. The new courthouse is the greatest architectural project that the city has undertaken in many years, and the violation of principle involved in this case would be of seriously bad effect for the future, both in New York and elsewhere.

"EVERY thoughtful man must admit that wealth is power, and that therefore liberty and such an inequality in the distribution of wealth as now exists can not permanently endure together." These words, with their air of logical inevitability, emanate from the Committee of 48, which recently met in St. Louis to lay the foundations of a new political party. The statement assumes the major premise that inequality of power in the individuals of whom the state is composed is per se destructive of liberty. But education is also power, and with equal logical validity might be substituted for wealth in the statement above quoted. If the Committee of 48 should accept the formula thus altered as equally true, and not damaging to its argument, we may go a step further back and substitute inborn intelligence, which is surely power of a very high degree, and no less unequally distributed than wealth, in society as it now exists. Now as inequality of intelligence, with the vast inequality of power which it entails, comes by birth itself, in accordance with biological laws which the Committee of 48 and its new political party are hardly competent to alter or repeal, we are driven by the Committee's peremptory logical formula to the somewhat dismal conclusion that our aspirations for liberty are merely an idle dream, inherently impossible of realization. But when we shake off the spell of the Committee's logic, we are confronted with the historical fact that such measure of human liberty as mankind has at any time and place enjoyed from the beginning of history to the present date has always coexisted with striking inequalities, not only of the power of wealth, but of many other kinds of power. That is to say, the suppressed major premise on which the Committee's conclusion rests has never been true of the growth of liberty in the past, and no proof has been adduced that it will be true in the development of liberty in the future.

IT is true, of course, that the "liberty" which we ordinarily have in mind in political discussions assumes equality of power in certain respects, as for instance in the power to participate in the government under which one lives, and to secure the equal protection of its laws. But when it comes to those kinds of power which spring from inborn qualities, and are increased by education and self-control, the existence of liberty does not demand the suppression of inequality. On the contrary, in many phases of life liberty tends to the development of inequality and is itself distinctly the gainer thereby. As for inequality of wealth, the ability to acquire and the disposition to save are and must always be vastly unequal, the one from qualities inborn, the other from traits of character developed as life goes on. With these natural or unavoidably acquired inequalities at the foundation, equality in results could come only by such an arbitrary control from without as would be wholly inconsistent with any true conception of personal liberty. Of course, the power of wealth can be abused, but the assumption of the Committee of 48 that it has been so abused as to make what are known as the laboring classes progressively poorer, and to threaten the extinction of liberty, is no less careless of fact than of logic. The dangers which threaten liberty are not to be found in the free development of the differing natural powers and aptitudes of the individual in legitimate fields of endeavor. The weakness of the position of the Committee of 48 lies in its attack upon inequality of wealth as an evil in itself, and not merely in its abuse. We may all hope and work for a material improvement in the pecuniary condition of the man who toils; but we shall make no advance in that direction by yielding to the idea that the accumulation of fortunes by able leaders in commerce and industry is incompatible with this improvement.

THERE has been much moralizing in the newspapers over the relative showing of public-school boys and private-school boys at college, as stated in statistics summarized and commented on in the current issue of the Harvard Graduates' Magazine. It appears that of the public-school boys, 2.5 per cent. obtained their degree at Harvard summa cum laude, as against only 0.5 per cent. of the boys from private schools; and that likewise the percentages in the magna cum laude class were 11.8 and 4.3, respectively. But the conclusion drawn from these figures, that the public-school training was better than that of the private schools, turns on one of the most familiar of statistical fallacies. Nearly all of the boys who go to the great private schools are sent to college, while among the public-school boys there is a sharp selection on the score not only of native ability, but also of inclination to study. In the one case we are dealing with substantially all the boys of certain families or of certain social classes, in the other case we have to do largely with a picked lot. Moreover, few of the public-school boys are sent to college simply to have a good time, or even desirable cultural surroundings; they are sent because they are anxious to accomplish something serious and because they have shown the ability to do it. The public-school training may, indeed, be better, either in promoting habits of study, or in its direct intellectual discipline, or both, than the private schools, but the figures cited are entirely inconclusive on the subject. They show that if you take at random a public-school boy who is sent to college and a private-school boy who is sent to college, the chances are that you will pick a better scholar if you choose the former. But they don't show at all that if you send a given boy to public school he is more likely to prove a good scholar at college than if you had sent him to private school.

BUT the fact that college men who hail from public schools do better, on the whole, than those who hail from private schools, does have a moral, and an important one. The moral is not that your boy will do better at college if you send him to public school. Your boy has a certain given endowment of intelligence. Placing him in the category of public-school-boys-who-go-to-college will not increase that endowment, and the figures above referred to leave the question of educational advantage open. The moral is rather that if you are looking for a boy (or girl) to send to college (whether you are an individual, an association, or the state), you will do well to look for him in the public schools. Not all, not more than a very small proportion, of the exceptional public-school boys and girls are able to go to college; there are others among them, just as capable of earning their summa cum laude and of winning distinction in after life, who long for a college education, and would be incalculably helped by it, but can not get it. Few tasks would be more rewarding than that of discovering such students, already highly endowed by nature, at an early age, and providing them with the sort of education that any rich man's child obtains as a matter of course.

AT the solemn stroke of twelve in the Christmas night, according to a widespread superstition of mediæval Europe, all running water turned into precious wine. For a human being to drink of it would have been certain death. An inquisitive woman of Lower Brittany went, at that miraculous hour, to the well for water, and heard a voice that said:

Et tu es proche de ta fin.

Every age has its own superstitions. Ours believes in a mystic connection of wine with the Anti-Christ, and works its own miracle by turning it all into water. But the poetic belief is lost that to drink of the miraculous liquid would desecrate the Christmas Feast.

The Deportation

THE law forbidding immigration of anarchists into this country, and providing for the deportation of such as may have entered in spite of it, was not enacted yesterday. It was not the product of hysterical fear, nor the outcome of the disturbed conditions brought on by the Great War. It has been on the statute books a score of years and more. Some thought its enactment unwise, or futile; but there was never the slightest ground for questioning the principle upon which it is justified. Every country has a right to state upon what terms it will admit outsiders to its borders, and what classes of immigrants it thinks fit to exclude.

All true Americans must feel an instinctive reluctance to depart in any instance from their country's tradition as a refuge for the oppressed and a land of opportunity for the unfortunate. But fine as is the spirit of that catholic hospitality which we so long exercised, it can not be invoked to set aside the obligations of a higher duty. The first duty of America is to preserve its own character. If that be really threatened by a flood of alien immigration, such as the crowded hundreds of millions of China made possible, it is not only our right but our duty to take such measures as are necessary to prevent it. If it be threatened by destructive agitation at the hands of alien revolutionists, it is our right and our duty to prevent that.

The deportation of 249 Russian revolutionaries last Sunday marked not the beginning of a period of frantic persecution, but the end of a period of long-suffering and good-natured patience. Anarchist plotters, most of them aliens, have been with us for several decades. During nearly all of this time we have wisely refrained from putting the law into vigorous operation against them. The time has at last come when every sensible person must understand that if we mean anything at all by the law, we must put it into action. It is a cheap and easy thing to say, as the Rev. Percy Stickney Grant is quoted as saying, that "to send three hundred or three million men away and try to stop the growth of ideas is not going to be successful." If anybody expects to stop the growth of anarchistic or socialistic ideas by deporting their alien advocates he is unquestionably doomed to disappointment. It is not the growth of ideas, but the specific activities of one class of agitators that is aimed at in the laws against alien revolutionists.

Whatever causes there may be within our own country that tend to breed discontent or revolution would continue to operate though every alien in the Union were deported. But it is no accident that so large a part of the worst and most violent forms which revolutionary discontent has taken in this country has been identified with the activities of alien agitators. It is absurd to ignore the fact that we have among us millions of ignorant, though for the most part well-intentioned immigrants, whose presence in our body politic can be regarded with complacency only upon condition that we may expect them gradually to grow into a realization of the essentials of our institutions. And this condition can not be fulfilled if their defenceless minds are subjected to the onslaughts of agitators whose only relation to our institutions is that of venomous hostility. By deporting a few hundred of them we not only get rid of these individuals, but give effective notice to thousands of others that this alien warfare against America can no longer be conducted under the protection of American law and with the advantages of American well-being.

It is doubtless the opinion of many that even for this immediate purpose the enactment and execution of proscriptive laws is bound to be a failure. No thoughtful person can fail to recognize that the cry of persecution, whether well-grounded or not, is a powerful factor on the other side. But the easy-going assumption that every act of suppression, however just, is sure to help more than to hurt the cause against which it is directed has no basis either in reason or in experience. A most impressive instance to the contrary is to be found in the history of the Chicago anarchists of thirty years ago. For years there had been going on in that city, and perfectly known to everybody, an organized anarchist agitation. A newspaper was regularly published in its interest. Its adherents held regular meetings for purposes of systematic training. It was a wise policy that permitted all this to go on without serious check until it culminated in the bomb-throwing massacre of policemen at the Haymarket. Then, after due trial, and after an appeal most carefully considered by the Supreme Court of Illinois, four of the leaders were hanged and several others sentenced to long terms of imprisonment. Did this fan the flame of anarchism in Chicago? Did ten anarchists spring up where one had been before? On the contrary, year after year, and decade after decade, one heard nothing more of Chicago anarchism except a pretty pilgrimage made every year—and quite undisturbed by the police—to put flowers on the graves of the four men who had forfeited their lives to the stern requirements of the law.

It is worth while to pause for a moment and think, not so much of the criminality as of the unspeakable insolence and effrontery of these foreign reformers of America. They came over not when Russia had undertaken to light mankind to the new heaven of Bolshevism, but years ago when their country was in the black night of Tsarist tyranny. Were we not so accustomed to the phenomenon, we should feel that for them to come here not to learn but to teach, not to help but to destroy, was a thing which only the inhabitants of Bedlam could look upon as normal or permissible. In their own minds, they may be idealists of the purest water; and so is many a poor inmate of the insane asylum. They are not insane, however, except as any man is insane who does not recognize the limitations which decency or modesty places upon his acts as a member of the society which entertains him. Our country falls short, to be sure, of its own ideals; and in many points it falls short of standards that other countries have attained. But these very people chose it because on the whole it is the best that mankind has thus far found itself able to beget; and it has been the very fount and origin of the liberal ideas that have gradually been overspreading the world, and the absence of which from their own country was the source of their revolt. It is a mawkish sentimentality that admires the morbid idealism of these creatures' thought and is blind to the naked indecency of their conduct.

Japan Reconsiders

THE cabled report of the statement of Lloyd George in Parliament last Thursday on certain features of Allied policy arrived at in the recent conference in London, is tantalizing in its brevity and paraphrasing. It is a pity that his reply to Sir Donald Maclean's question was not transmitted verbatim, for it is not always safe to draw conclusions from the remarks of the elusive Welshman when filtered through a reporter; this is a task of sufficient difficulty when you have his own words. Two points, however, stand forth with some clearness; both are reassuring, and one is provocative of considerable curiosity.

In the first place, while reiterating that he had passed to a policy of non-interference in Russia, he apparently set at rest the fears, and disposed of the persistent rumors, that he was inclined to grant recognition to the Soviet Government. It was easy for him to say: "If the Bolsheviki want to speak for Russia, they can do so by summoning a National Assembly, freely elected," for he knew that this was the last thing they would agree to do. But even at that he was begging the whole question, because he is perfectly aware that such an elected assembly under present conditions would be a fantastic absurdity. There is reason to believe that powerful and unscrupulous financial interests have brought strong pressure to bear upon him to secure the recognition of the Soviet Government in order that they might take advantage of Lenin's proffered concessions. And there is no doubt that there lurks in his mind the idea that it is to England's interest that the future Russia be hobbled.

His second point gives rise to interesting conjectures. What did he mean by saying that discussions were proceeding between the United States and Japan concerning future action should the Bolshevik advance reach to any considerable degree eastward? Certainly our own Government has given us no indication that any such negotiations were taking place, and we have been under the general impression that our immediate policy was that of nagging at Japan because of her unwillingness to include Manchuria and Inner Mongolia within the field covered by the Consortium, and that further we were far from being in agreement with her with reference to the question of the Siberian Railway and the functions of our respective military forces in Eastern Siberia.

In view of the decided change in Japanese policy towards Siberia during the past few months, the statement of Lloyd George is definitely reassuring. It is not too much to say that this change makes possible a degree of coöperation with Japan that has hitherto seemed out of the question, and may perhaps be the basis of a relationship that shall set at rest once and for all the misunderstandings and jealousies that might have threatened a future war in the Orient.

When the Bolsheviks first occupied Siberia, Japan was slow to realize the wider significance of the Bolshevik movement. Rather did this occupation and the overturn of the Bolsheviks which followed the Czechoslovak struggle present themselves to the imperialistic group in Japan as opportunities for an actual domination of Siberia. Diplomatically they expressed themselves as ready to undertake the restoration of order by military force, provided they were properly compensated by special rights and concessions. Their policy was directed toward keeping Siberia in political turmoil and preventing the establishment of a strong and unified Russian Government. The object seemed to be the acquisition of economic domination during a period of weakness.

Within the past few months, however, Japanese policy has undergone a complete change. The reasons are twofold. First, Japan has come to fear the menace of the spread of Bolshevism to China, and secondly, her statesmen now realize that the conquest of the good will of the Russians by economic reconstruction along lines mutually beneficial and profitable is a far better guaranty of Japan's future welfare than any forcible domination could be.

The danger of Bolshevism is very real.

Japan knows the susceptibility of the millions of China to movements of that sort, and she has also experienced among her own people disquieting developments, for Bolshevik propagandists have been extremely active all over the Orient.

Her analysis of the present situation from a politico-economic standpoint is highly illuminating. Japan sees before her the possibility of a conflict with America. She analyzes the situation cold-bloodedly. America raised an enormous army for the World War. Japan observes with alarm the increase of our Pacific fleet and the construction of a great naval base in Hawaii. Taking stock of her own position, she notes that her lack of coal and iron places her at the mercy of the United States, and that an embargo on steel, without any declaration of war on our part, would quickly bring her to her knees. To extricate herself from this situation she must secure raw materials from the Asiatic mainland. The best way to do this is in coöperation and alliance with the future Russia, and not by violence or compulsion.

It is the lesson of the Twenty-one Points over again. More flies are caught by molasses than by vinegar. Therefore, instead of alienating the Russians and by arrogant and arbitrary conduct making of them a potential enemy, the Japanese now see that by undertaking economic enterprise in Siberia in such a way that the Russians themselves shall participate and appear to take the lead, they can secure all the material benefits and at the same time lay the basis of strong national friendship. It is perhaps true that in making this change of policy they are but following the German plans for the penetration of European Russia, but it is a wise change and there is nothing to hinder American coöperation and the allaying of irritation between the two countries.

It may very well be a fact that Japan is now ready to send large additional forces into Siberia to prevent the Reds from penetrating east of Baikal, but it seems equally certain that if this is done, it will not be with the idea of acquiring Siberian territory or imposing economic domination by force. Rather will every effort be made to conciliate the Russians and assist them in the reconstruction of their own industrial life through silent Japanese participation.

It would be well if, on our part, we should realize the significance of this striking change of Japanese policy and take the necessary steps towards coöperation. In this way we can quickly put an end to the bickerings in Siberia itself and reassure Japan as to our own intentions. The path seems open to the kind of economic coöperation that is the best antidote to dangerous political suspicion and irritation.

Rhode Island's Protest

THERE may be reasons which the Supreme Court will regard as valid grounds for declaring that the Eighteenth Amendment has not been duly adopted and made part of the Constitution of the United States. There are questions of procedure—in particular the question of what constitutes the vote of “two-thirds of both houses” of Congress, and the question of ratification by the Legislature when a State Constitution requires the approval of such ratification by popular vote—upon which the Supreme Court may possibly decide adversely to the amendment. But it is safe to say that the amendment will not be pronounced invalid on the ground that it is in its nature beyond the scope of Article V of the Constitution.

Apart from a limitation that expired in 1808, there is no restriction upon the power of amendment by the process laid down in Article V, except that which declares that “no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.” Reference has been made to the Tenth Amendment, which declares that “the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people”; but this is of no avail as against an amendment of the Constitution adopted in accordance with the prescribed procedure. Such an amendment, it is declared in Article V, “shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution”; if the Tenth Amendment had been designed to prevent any future delegation of power to the United States, it would have so declared in plain terms. “The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution” means powers not delegated by the Constitution, either as originally made or as subsequently amended; such a power was granted, for instance, in the Sixteenth Amendment, authorizing a Federal income tax. Nor is there any weight in arguments based on the general notion of a “republican form of government”; for a judicial body to declare the prohibition amendment void because it is destructive of a republican form of government would be an assumption of authority too fantastic to be seriously considered.

Nevertheless, Rhode Island's manful protest against the fundamental wrong which the Eighteenth Amendment has done to our institutions should be of profound interest to every American. Little Rhody puts her bigger sisters to the blush. She declares, in her brief to the Supreme Court, that the people of Rhode Island have always enjoyed “full powers of self-government in all matters relating to the internal affairs of said State,” and asserts that her police power in that domain can not be “bargained away, surrendered, yielded, or transferred effectually to bind the people of said State and their posterity, if at all, without an ‘explicit and authentic act of the whole’ people of said State.” Whatever the legal validity of this plea, the fact to which it refers is stated none too strongly. What the Legislature of State after State has blithely done—has done with less real deliberation than is usually expended upon a paltry bit of everyday legislation—has precisely the character that Rhode Island declares. They have “bargained away and surrendered” fundamental State powers, which, until a few years ago, nobody thought of questioning; and they have done it in such a way as “to bind the people of the State and their posterity,” beyond the possibility of future reclamation by any action within their power.

Not since the formation of the Union has so gross an injury been done to the character of American institutions. For the injury has been threefold. It has struck a blow at the very life of the idea of State autonomy in State affairs, and has made easy the path of every agitation that may arise in the future for the concentration at Washington of power over any matter of local concern which the itch for regulation may seize upon as its next victim. It has swept away whatever was left of authority in the idea of the liberty of the individual to lead his own life in his own way, subject to respect for the right of others to do likewise. And last but not least, it has immeasurably lowered the standing of the Constitution of the United States by imbedding into its substance a mere police regulation, and entrenching it behind those safeguards which were designed for the preservation of the nation and the protection of the essentials of liberty.

If Rhode Island's protest should help to awaken the nation to a sense of what the prohibition amendment means, it will not have been made in vain, even if it accomplishes no juristic result. And the same thing is true of the great popular vote recorded against the Eighteenth Amendment in Ohio. It is not many years since it was regarded as a truism by most Americans that prohibition, if justified at all, was justified only in case it had behind it an overwhelming sentiment in the community immediately affected. The spectacle of a rural majority imposing its will upon great urban communities, even within the limits of a given State, offended our instincts as freemen. It is good to see, in such a State as Ohio, a full half of all the voters condemning the iron rule that has been laid upon them and their children's children by the Eighteenth Amendment. Additional point is given to this result by a circumstance which was made much of by the prohibitionists when the early returns indicated a big victory for them.

It was claimed that the Ohio result was more significant than the “wet” victory in New Jersey, because Ohio had found out by experience what the “dry” régime was like; now the tables are turned on those who made that claim. And numerous town elections in New England, giving “wet” majorities, tell the same story.

It is certain that the people opposed to prohibition in many of our States are either a majority, or a minority falling little short of a majority. Yet upon millions of people there has been forced a regulation of their daily life which it is beyond the power of any majority in a single State, or of the combined majorities of thirty-five out of our forty-eight States, to abolish or relax. To fasten this kind of bond on the American people, and enforce it by the constant exertion of Federal power, can not fail to have a debilitating effect upon the political character of the American people. But if it can not be thrown off, it is at least something that it should be resented. The State of Rhode Island, the people of Ohio, and the anti-prohibition voters in the New England town-elections have done an important service in at least showing the country that the Eighteenth Amendment is not being accepted without serious protest.

Winter's for Books

The swaying shadow faintly double;
With fire, glass, and pipe, and book,
Heigh ho to care and trouble!”

WINTER'S for books. Not a doubt of it. The garden is bleak, with no more wish to be looked at than a lady in curl papers. The sea can manage but a wan smile at best. A brook running black between shores of jagged ice may set off the brightness of a brief walk at noonday. More venturesome, “all shod with steel,” one may, like Wordsworth, in early evening “cut across the reflex of a star.” Of a morning the motor turns over reluctantly, stiff in the joints, poor thing, as its owner will be too, if he insists on sharing the rutted road with a busy wind. The best of life is within doors. A clear fire. And a book.

A pretty picture, is it not? made up—who said it?—very largely of what in these days we briefly dismiss as “bunk.” There is nothing in the glass. The fire is a purring and spitting monstrosity of gilt. No one would think of reading by candle-light. A pear of light, energized by God knows how many volts or watts or horsepower, blazes under the “art” shade at elbow. And there, perhaps, lies the trouble. Light. When man took Divinity at his word and turned on the electric switch, what a change was there! Copernicus when he shifted our celestial centre of motion from earth to sun did no more. Seated betwixt the crossing shadows of hickory fire and of tallow dip, man was the centre of the universe. Encircling night soothed and sustained. And by magic virtue of the volume on his knee, into what a world he stepped—he, the all-seeing, watcher alike of beginning and of end, confidant of the great and the small, of the evil and of the good! But in a world whose night is riven a thousand ways by electric light, how shut out this world that we may gain another? Like Strassburg geese we must be up and feeding. Like moths we must be giddily dancing. With so much light abroad there must be something to see. Let us go out at once lest we miss it.

"Much have I travelled in the realms of gold," sang Keats, when he had never journeyed beyond the suburbs of London. Is it because they lie so adjacent to us that we do not visit them oftener? Is it because entrance is so easy that it does not seem worth the trouble? Happening to live next door to some splendid monument that all the world comes to see, do we put off a glance at it to a time that never comes? Does it ask a little courage, the plunge? Most certainly everything else asks courage, and is there anything that gives so much in return? Enter where you will; there are a thousand gates. Be sure that in the time given to the reading of a book many times its price would otherwise have gone to the purchase of far less valuable merchandise.

"Books delight us, when prosperity smiles upon us; they comfort us inseparably when stormy fortune frowns on us. They lend validity to human compacts, and no serious judgments are propounded without their help. Arts and sciences, all the advantages of which no mind can enumerate, consist in books. How highly must we estimate the wondrous power of books, since through them we survey the utmost bounds of the world and of time, and contemplate the things that are as well as those that are not, as in the mirror of eternity." It is almost six hundred years since the good Bishop and Chancellor, Richard of Bury, penned those words, and the world's point of view may have shifted a little. A book was hard to come at in those days; perhaps the more cherished for that very reason. We are less satisfied than he that everything worth knowing is to be found in books. There is much virtue, we are sure, in doing. And we are not sure that the books are always right.

For all that, books are still the most comfortable of teachers. "Consider," says Richard again in his "Love of Books," "what pleasantness of teaching there is in books, how easy, how secret! How safely we lay bare the poverty of human ignorance to books without feeling any shame! They are masters who instruct us without rod or ferule, without angry words, without gifts of clothes or money. If you come to them they are not asleep; if you ask and enquire of them they do not withdraw themselves; they do not chide if you make mistakes; they do not laugh if you are ignorant." Where else, indeed, can experience be bought at a rate less dear? Where else find such convenient summations and epitomes of experience which, for the best of us, is inevitably something scattered and not a little perplexed?

It is said that there have been in the world only three really interesting events, the Trojan War, the French Revolution—and these days of ours. And for an understanding of the last we are as dependent on books as in the case of the other two. Gradually, through the reading of many books we shall come to know something of the war through which we have passed. Gradually we shall grow able to reckon with the tremendous forces that are seeking equilibrium. In the novelists and the poets we can see prophetically the form and pressure which this age of ours will present to our descendants. Do not scorn these last without at least reading them; do not neglect them without being sure of the way to something that seems better; and do not at the other extreme leave the dead past—perhaps more surely alive than the present—to bury its books unread in libraries.

"In books," says Richard yet again, "I find the dead as if they were alive . . . All things are corrupted and decay in time . . . all the glory of the world would be buried in oblivion unless God had provided mortals with the remedy of books." Not only the dead as if they were alive—Troy unburned, Rome un-fallen, the song of the troubadour unstilled, the walls of the Globe Theatre yet echoing to Shakespeare's words, Dr. Johnson still talking immortally, all the poets still singing as if they never would grow old—not only this, but those who have never died, the friends whom we made years ago in the happy intimacy of long winter evenings, are still there waiting for us. We may grow old, but not they. Our friends in the flesh may disappoint us or leave us; nothing in the shifting world may present to us the familiar face of old. But the people with whom we have lived through the pages of a book are unchanging and immortal. "Now," said Balzac, returning from a crowded company to the solitude of his own library, "now for some real people." And it can not be said that Balzac did not know the world. Viewed, then, either as a refuge from the present or as a means of conquering it, as a refreshment or as a weapon, books are the one thing in these spare days that we can not go without. And winter's for books.

Kautsky's Exposure

KARL MARX taught that the course of history is not decided by individual persons and institutions, but in the last instance by economic forces. Capitalism creates everywhere imperialism, the desire for violent expansion of territory. In capitalism, therefore, the Socialists see the cause of the War. It is this doctrinaire way of judging the history of the last five years which has made international Socialism seem in league with the imperialism of Germany. Public opinion, both in neutral and Entente countries, found instinctively the truth to which the Socialists were blinded by their theories. It knew that the War had been made in Germany, and held the ex-Kaiser and his counsellors responsible for it. And now that the criminals are beaten, the chief exponent of Marxism in Germany, the historian Karl Kautsky, has come forward with an indictment of them more crushing than any enemy or neutral could produce, as neither hatred nor moral indignation, but the cool reasoning of a disbeliever in individual responsibility for the world's destinies, has dictated the verdict. "A Marxist," says Kautsky, "who would argue that imperialism would in any case have led to war, whatever Germany's policy might have been, acts like a man taking the part of little rascals who have played at throwing burning matches into a barrel of powder. But the Berlin boys knew that the powder was there; they had, in fact, deposited the bulk of it themselves."

Extracts from Kautsky's book have appeared in the papers, but it is only from a perusal of the whole work, both the documents and the commentary, that one gains the full impression of its terrible importance. For the first time, irrefutable evidence is produced of the ex-Kaiser's full complicity with his criminal advisers. The book disposes for good of the legend, faithfully spread by loyal subjects of the War Lord since fate and the world began to turn against him, that his ministers had confided in him only in so far as it might serve their own aggressive ends. Prince Lichnowsky's famous memorandum was, until recently, the only authority for the story of Von Tschirschky, the German Ambassador at Vienna, having received a reprimand for reporting that he had advised the Government in Vienna to adopt greater moderation towards Serbia. Kautsky produces the report in question, together with the marginal notes of Von Tschirschky's Imperial master, the contents of which bear out Lichnowsky's almost incredible statement.

"I often hear the desire expressed, even by serious people," the Ambassador wrote, "that the Serbians might be scored off once for all (Now or never! is the Emperor's comment). First, they say, we must confront them with a series of demands, and when they refuse to comply with these, we must proceed by forcible means. On all such occasions I take care quietly, but emphatically and earnestly, to warn against precipitation." (Who has given him authority for that? is the comment. That is very stupid! It is no concern of his at all, as it is exclusively for Austria to decide what is to be done. It will be said afterwards, if matters go wrong, that Germany backed out. Tschirschky must please stop this nonsense! With the Serbians accounts must be settled, and the sooner the better.) This document, with the notes in the margin, was returned to the Foreign Office on July 4, nineteen days before the Austrian ultimatum was delivered at Belgrade. The Kaiser's comments on the subsequent development of affairs as described in the reports of the Ambassador in Vienna, show him impatient of delay. Not until July 14 could Tschirschky report that the Hungarian Government had given its full approval to the criminal scheme.

On July 23, the fatal note was delivered at Belgrade by the Austrian Minister. In a telegram to Vienna he referred to it as an "ultimatum," but an immediate reprimand was the reply to this tactless designation, the note, it was explained to him, being only "a time-limited step" (eine befristete Démarche), as its refusal would not instantly be answered with a declaration of war, but only with the breaking off of the diplomatic relations. The German Government has always professed not to have known the contents of this notorious document until it was officially brought to the knowledge of all the Powers. Even if this denial of complicity be taken to refer to the verbal text only, and not to its general tenor as agreed upon in Berlin on July 6, it is proved to be a falsehood by the evidence that Kautsky produces from the archives. A copy of the note, despatched by Von Tschirschky, was received at the Foreign Office in Berlin in the afternoon of July 22, two full days earlier than it was made known to the other Powers, and certainly a sufficient time before the handing of the original at Belgrade for the German Government to have prevented that decisive step if such had been the wish of the statesmen at Berlin. Serbia's unexpected compliance with the exorbitant conditions of the befristete Démarche made it extremely difficult for Germany to play the double part of seeming, in the eyes of the world, honestly solicitous to preserve peace and of secretly backing up Austria in getting her war with Serbia. The British proposals for mediation could not flatly be declined, "as that would make us stand condemned before the whole world as responsible for the conflagration, and as the real instigators of the War. This would also make our own position in the country impossible, which must be brought to believe that we were forced into the War." Thus wrote Von Bethmann-Hollweg in a despatch to Von Tschirschky of July 27.

The Emperor's marginal comments of the last days of July do not betray the slightest hesitancy or agitation at the certain approach of the great war. Sir Edward Grey's prediction, quoted by Prince Lichnowsky, that "the war would bring in its train revolutionary movements as in 1848 in consequence of languishing commerce" is waived by the imperial amateur-statesman with an incredulous exclamation mark. Sir Edward's offer to insist, jointly with Germany, on an extension by Austria of the time limit for Serbia's reply is discarded with a peremptory needless. The possibility hinted at by Grey that Austria might bleed to death as a consequence of a protracted war is made light of with a sneering nonsense! The greater is his disappointment and his rage when, four days later, on July 29, he receives Sir Edward's warning, passed on by Lichnowsky, that England, though willing to act as a mediator between Austria, Serbia, and Russia, would not engage to maintain her neutrality in the event of a war between Germany and France. In a spasm of fury he fills the margin with vituperative language against the mean cheat (meaning Sir Edward Grey), whose policy is so thoroughly vile and mephistophelian, but typically English. But if Germany, through England's treachery, is to bleed to death, she shall be revenged by causing England to lose British India! Our consuls in Turkey and India, our agents, etc., must rouse the entire Mohammedan world into a wild revolt against this hated, lying, unscrupulous race of grocers. He is resigned to the prospect of his country bleeding to death if only England be hurled with it into the maelstrom!

On the Chancellor and the Foreign Office, on the other hand, the British outspokenness had a sobering effect. From July 29 on, Berlin honestly worked to avoid the war which, without Italy's aid and with Great Britain as an opponent, was bound to lead to Germany's destruction. But this belated action for peace was thwarted by Austria's refusal to enter into negotiations with Russia and the insistence of the German General Staff on the necessity of striking the first blow. Since the German diplomats had brought the country to the verge of war, it had become the duty of the military authorities to carry it through the war as quickly and at as little cost as possible. And this immediate preparedness required mobilization, which, according to the conception of the General Staff, meant war. Von Bethmann had lost control over the spirits which he himself had called up. The military leaders assumed command, and the Chancellor became the obedient executant of their orders. They began the war against Russia and France and left it to Bethmann to make the world believe that those countries were the aggressors. In a memorandum of August 5, Von Moltke, Chief of the General Staff, prescribes to the Chancellor the policy that must be followed: Revolts must be stirred up among the Poles against Russia, in Egypt and India against the British, in Morocco and Algiers against the French. Influential German-Americans must manipulate the American press in Germany's favor. "Perhaps the United States can be persuaded to undertake an action at sea against England, for which Canada will be its reward." When the United States can not be won over to the German side, Mexico is approached and offered some of the States of the Union as a bait. At the same time the General Staff makes a bid for the aid of the insurgents in Ireland, the anarchists in Italy, the dynamiters in America, and, ultimately, of the Bolsheviki in Russia. "Lenin and Trotsky," writes Kautsky, "were not the first, as one sees, to try to rescue their cause from an impossible situation by letting their emissaries stir up a world-revolution. But it is a superstition—which many advocates of the world-revolution share with the shortsighted German politicians—that revolutions can be called forth ad libitum by skillful, active and well-moneyed agents."

Kautsky has done a good work in the publication of these documents and his clear and searching commentary. The world, and the German nation first of all, owes him a debt of gratitude for his unsparing revelation of the truth. The book may bring a change in the long-stagnant question of the ex-Kaiser's trial. It exposes him as a reckless criminal bent on war, the chief conspirator against the peace of the world. Does not this discovery of his real character make it incumbent on Germany herself to bring him to trial for the crime which brought this endless woe upon the nation?

What Will the Radicals Eat?

I AM wondering how the American Bolsheviks, red and pink, are planning to handle the food problem. I hold no brief for the present social order. Society argues its own briefs without regard to you and me. But I am struck with certain inconveniences in the evening-up process as revealed by Europe's experience in feeding herself after the war. There too they have tried to destroy human institutions, and the net result so far discernible is that several millions of the best people are dead and the rest are very irregular at their meals.

However much the army of the Left may differ from other armies, it must be like them in this, that it, too, marches on its stomach. Was not one of the first steps of the Soviets in Russia and the Hungary House in Budapest to increase the ration of the faithful? New York, in which swarm radicals of all shades, finds its machinery severely tested to keep itself fed. What are the Bolsheviks of the Boulevards planning to do when for the present severely tried order they have substituted one of their own? This matter of food supply is not without its perplexities when you and I and our brothers insist upon living in a large city far away from where the green things grow. The capitalistic order has arranged a machinery whereby food comes to all with some regularity. Week in and week out New York eats its 10,000 tons of grain, its 8,000 tons of meat, its 40,000 tons, more or less, of other foodstuffs. There is nothing to indicate that New York will eat less under the coming dispensation. Certainly then as now there will be needed the thousands of cars, the miles of multiple tracks to transport the foodstuffs, and the complicated financial structure of banking, to carry New York's hundred-million-dollar-a-week kitchen bill. For my part I do not care so much that capitalism shall do this as that it shall continue to be done.

There are only two ways of keeping up your food supply. If you are a true individualist with no capitalistic taint, you can raise it yourself with a sharp stick. But if you live with your fellows you are very likely to use some of society's machinery in a rudimentary or developed form. If you live in New York, or some other large city, the form is likely to be very intricate indeed and to depend very much upon accumulated capital. It may be handled by a magnified form of communism if a commune can learn the technique; but the principle will be capitalism just the same. Capital will be required to transport your food, to store it, and to pay the farmer for it upon delivery some months before you pay for it at your grocer's.

I have no record of any member of any of the more radical groups raising his food for himself. Believers in "direct action" with regard to man's accumulated stocks and organized institutions, they take no direct action with respect to nature. Assuming some credit for courage in calling a spade a spade, they do not often use one. Much as he attacks capital, your radical reformer is always found where capital is. He takes his place in the great city or at a mine. He does not appear on the farms. It is a mistake to say that the Bolsheviks took Russia and Hungary. The Bolsheviks took Petrograd and Budapest, and held them just as long as the country behind could or would provide food. Your American Bolshevik lives in New York, Chicago, or some other large city. He is as likely as not to belong to the leisure classes, whose income was long ago guaranteed, or to be an artist or a poet to whom "society owes a living."

In order that you and I, as city dwellers, shall be fed, two things are necessary. First, an internal economic machinery of distribution; second, a system of values so that the producer may be immediately compensated for his work and encouraged to continue it. What the attitude of our Bolshevik is toward the capital which stands at the basis of banking, transportation, and storage, we know. It is to enjoy the fruits of capital and organization and to strike at their roots of efficiency and power to be of service. Even more insidious still is his attack on values by which the food producer is compensated for his labor. Reduced to its simplest term, the trade between the farmer who produces the food and the city man who eats it is a trade between foodstuffs and the manufactured goods the farmer needs. Says a British statesman, "In the main a country's agricultural produce is exchanged against manufactured articles. If industry is not producing, the farmer can not exchange his products against these articles, and, on the other hand, the industrial community has no purchasing power. It can only offer a currency which is rapidly depreciating and which the farmer will therefore refuse." The farmer accepts money, of course, but the money stands for a parity of value between the foodstuffs and the manufactured goods. This parity the Bolshevik would vitiate, has indeed vitiated in Russia and Hungary, by issuing superfluous money, and has tried to vitiate in America by reducing the production of manufactured goods while accepting an ever-increasing supply of foodstuffs. He would create by social fiat a standard of exchange to impose upon the farmer who produces by individual labor. He continues to eat and demand more from the soil and the tiller of the soil, while giving less labor for fewer hours. He demands more value in wheat, corn, and pork, for less value in machinery, coal, and clothing. He expects by manipulation of money to change the relationships between what the farmer grows and what the city man manufactures.

Fortunately for your farmer but unfortunately for your city man, the farmer has the last word on this. The farmer knows that he is the producer of the commodities of first necessity. His mind is never confused by money. For true value he looks to things or land, and he will not surrender his foodstuffs except for true value. When money becomes useless, the farmer turns away from money entirely and begins to hoard and barter. For a time after the Civil War in America, things were cheap and money was dear. That was a time of overproduction from the land. Such times do not promise soon to return. Money is so cheap in some parts of Europe to-day that it has practically lost value. If you want to get a goose in Hungary you have to take a pair of boots out into the country and barter directly with the farmer who needs boots.

As long as we are not all willing to work the soil, we must pay for our food a coin acceptable to the man who does work the soil. And that can not be done by the fiat of reform, by the changing of social order, the destruction of economic machinery, the issuing of more money, or the reduction in production of manufactured goods. It can be done only by work which will create something the farmer will accept for his produce. Lord Robert Cecil is authority for the statement that before the war four hundred million Europeans just managed to feed, clothe, and shelter themselves, and to amass six months' capital on which to live. Now that capital has vanished; Europe is to all intents and purposes on a non-capital basis. Is there anything in this to encourage the farmer to grow produce for the great mass of people who have no contact with the land? Hungary had its chance to prove the contention of the communists. But the farmers refused to exchange their produce for the useless scrip of the Soviets, and at a breath of outside influence Bela Kun fell. He and his followers were underfed and thousands of his unfortunate fellow-citizens were dead of starvation in an agricultural country. The cry that is going up to-day against the blockade on Russia adds no strength to the radical cause. Under normal conditions Russia does not need to import foodstuffs. She is an exporting nation. The demand that food from America shall now support the Soviets at Petrograd is simply the demand that capital shall support abroad an order that is subversive of its strength to be of service to society. Capital is too much burdened at home to seek abroad such destructive philanthropy.

The answer to the difficulties does not lie in an impossible and parasitic communism. It lies in the demand that all groups of society play their part in the support of that order that must stand on a league of the agricultural with the industrial, or sink altogether to the agricultural. It lies not in putting greater burdens on the producers of foodstuffs, for these producers can easily cease to carry their burdens. It lies in adjusting the burdens between the producers of manufactured goods and the producers of foodstuffs.

If that is not done we shall have a reconstruction of society by rules more fundamental than those of the reformers, a reconstruction which has started in Europe and which is proceeding by two processes: first, the reduction of the population by starvation; second, a radical change of base by large groups of society back to the soil.

If our radical groups sincerely wish to see the order of urban life with all its advantages maintained and strengthened, let them take heed of the words of one who has much sympathy with the wrongs of labor and wishes to put labor in its proper place in the social order, a man moreover who knows how the pinch of hunger twinges in the stomachs of a hundred million people. The words were spoken of Europe, but they have no less application to America. Herbert Hoover writes, "No economic policy will bring food to those stomachs or fuel to those hearths that does not secure the maximum production. There is no use of tears over raising prices; they are to a great degree a visualization of insufficient production."

Impressions from Hungary

CORRESPONDENCE received from well-informed sources in Hungary indicates something of the full measure which that country is paying for its share in the war. The Rumanians have pillaged and requisitioned to an extent unbelievable unless seen. Not only has the greater portion of the transportation, both of the railroads and of private individuals, in the form of automobiles, trucks, wagons, etc., been taken to Rumania, but also the majority of the cattle and crops, the last to such an extent that the seed for next year is lacking. They have, by their requisitioning and theft, put some 200,000 industrial workers and their families in dire distress, and have likewise prevented the payment of any indemnity to the Entente by Hungary.

As a consequence, the country is in a state of utter disorganization. It takes ten days for a letter to go from one section of Budapest to another, writes another of our informants. One may guess from this what the communication will be between distant parts of the country. The population is starving and entirely dependent on sustenance from abroad. The American Relief Administration European Children's Fund is doing all it can to save the rising generation from becoming lost to the future. Mr. Gardner Richardson, who has organized the relief work at Budapest, arrived there on October 7, and in consultation with the Government began immediately to prepare for the opening of children's kitchens. Nearly a hundred of these desperately needed relief stations are running now full blast, and giving one meal every day to 100,000 children. The people's recognition of our good services finds expression in the esteem shown to the Stars and Stripes. The little American flag on the door of a freight car, or an automobile, or pasted on a parcel, or a piece of baggage, is a surer means of protection than policemen or armed soldiers are.

The Hungarian Government of Mr. Friedrich has cooperated with the Americans in a splendid spirit. An appropriation of 5,000,000 kronen was contributed towards the defrayal of the expenses of organization and administration of the relief. But far more is needed. The programme so far outlined will demand close to $1,000,000, in addition to the funds already secured, and this money is being raised chiefly among Americans of Hungarian extraction, on whom the responsibility for this relief work rests. The writer warns emphatically against sending money over to Hungary. It is worthless there, as there is nothing to buy.

The Hungarian has never been known as a hard worker, and under the present trying conditions he has the business ability of a child. Yet, economically, Hungary can be made self-sustaining; since for the population of the reduced territory, amounting to about ten million, there is sufficient agricultural land, coal mines, and iron mines remaining to them. Foreign aid, however, is needed to make these natural resources productive. Owing to the depreciation of the krone, the chances for investment of foreign capital are extremely good, in the first place because of the relatively small investment necessary to be made in foreign security or money; secondly, because of the great need of capital for practically every concern in Hungary. The Italians have already purchased the Wood Bank and a number of properties. The English have likewise invested to a considerable degree, and are now negotiating for a loan of about one hundred million pounds against the railroads of the country. The United States is handicapped both because of its distance, and the lack of any governmental or commercial agents in the country. The attitude of the Hungarian towards Americans is such that they prefer them to everyone except, perhaps, the British. They are not desirous of doing business with either the French or the Italians. Of their feelings towards the Germans and the resumption of the peaceful penetration of the country by German influences the same correspondent gives some interesting details. The former ally is already marketing her commodities in Hungary at a ridiculously low rate and giving two-year credits, and, unquestionably repulsive as the idea is to the Hungarian, the country will again become dependent upon Germany. She alone supplies the countries of the old Dual Monarchy with food, clothing, raw materials, and manufactured products on a credit basis acceptable to them. Germany, to the writer's positive knowledge, is the only country on the Continent where the supply of fuel is adequate and the factories are working day and night. One example of their cleverness is that in their replacements in Belgium of machinery carried away during the occupation, they have sent brand-new German machinery so that all spare parts for such plant will hereafter have to come from the same German factories. It would appear that the German dream of a "Mittel Europa" is nearer realization to-day than ever before.

Hungary has, indeed, some industries of her own. The largest factory is the metal fabrication plant of Manfred Weiss, situated at Colpel, in the neighborhood of Budapest. This plant normally employs 36,000 workmen, and during the war this number was increased to 50,000. At Györ are the plants of the Skoda Cannon Factory and a large car shop. At the smaller factories beet sugar and agricultural implements are mainly manufactured, of the latter about 60 per cent. of the national need. From the industrial workers in these factories the Social Democratic Party recruits most of its members, being three per cent. of the ten million people inhabiting the new Hungary. Their recent experience of Bolshevism has sobered both the working and the governing classes. The Social Democrats have agreed to remove from their platform the elimination of class distinction, and the Government, which has always opposed any labor organization, is beginning to realize that it is better to utilize labor than to fight it.

All things considered, Hungary, in spite of Bolshevik rule and Rumanian pillage, seems to be in a much better condition than her sister-state Austria. To American business the country offers a wide field for enterprise. The writer would rather favor an investment of capital than the purchase of anything for export, and if importation were contemplated, it would of course be necessary to grant extended credit, as the Germans do. There is also an opportunity for the establishment of a bank to take the place of the Trans-Atlantic Trust Company, in view of the fact that there are about two million Hungarians in the United States, all of whom continually send remittances to Hungary. The people would view an initiative in this line from the American side with enthusiasm. The splendid organization set up by Mr. Hoover's representatives and now utilized by Captain Richardson for his relief work, and the energetic manner in which the United States General H. H. Bandholtz, of Philippine fame, has dealt with the Rumanian invaders, have made the Americans very popular among all classes in Hungary.

Sir Robert Borden

THE somewhat unexpected retirement* of Sir Robert Borden from the Canadian Premiership is calculated to affect the political situation in the Dominion to a degree that leaves the immediate consequences very much in the realm of speculation. Until the announcement of his determination to withdraw from the high office which he held since 1911, few realized the importance of the man and of the position that he occupied in the eyes of the country. His disappearance from the scene was considered to be so remote that scarcely any person calculated the results—especially as they might affect the political future of Canada. Now, however, that he has made the momentous announcement, everything has been cast into such a state of confusion that only time can draw any semblance of order out of the chaotic outlook. It is certainly now opportune to glance back over the recent years and briefly estimate the importance of the part played by Sir Robert Borden in the country's affairs during the most trying period of her history since the time of the Confederation.

Unlike Sir John A. Macdonald, Bor-

den was not a keen and wily politician possessed of that peculiar magnetism which draws men irresistibly to his following; unlike Sir Wilfrid Laurier, he was not a polished orator, in both languages; but he possessed other and very important qualifications for leadership, which, if slow in development, became more and more manifest as circumstances of increasing national importance arose. In the public life of the Dominion he has, since 1896, come slowly to be recognized as a man of exceptional parts. When he entered the Federal field the Conservative party was fresh from an overwhelming defeat, without cohesion in its ranks, and without a leader of any prominence. The choice, despite grave opposition, fell upon the new member from Halifax. Even after he became leader of the Opposition, and consequently of the Conservative party, there was a considerable amount of friction between the members of his following; and, after the defeat of the Conservatives at the polls in 1900, there was a threat of replacing him in the leadership. Once again his party was defeated, but so able was his management during succeeding sessions that his qualities of leadership became more apparent. At last, the suddenly called election of 1911 swept him into power. It was unexpected, even by the most sanguine of Conservatives; consequently all the more to the credit of Borden.

He assumed the Premiership under peculiar circumstances; the prestige of the recent victory was a source of great encouragement; the lack of a defined policy, of experience on the part of his new Ministry, and of absolute unanimity on certain issues militated against him. During three years Sir Robert Borden worked night and day and brought every means of fortifying his Government into play. It was a huge task; and, as it progressed, he displayed an ever increasing energy, keen-sightedness, and tact. Yet, all this was in the purely domestic sphere; outside of Canada little was known of the political situation, and the Dominion's foreign relations were so restricted that there was no real opportunity for him to display any of the qualities that have since dawned upon the public. Had old conditions continued, it is quite possible that Borden would have held the Premiership of Canada for a number of years, and have relinquished the position leaving behind him the reputation of an able lawyer and a conscientious administrator, with a great willingness to devote his whole attention to the improvement of the Dominion's prospects.

The year 1914 brought the war. With a keenness of vision for which few had given him credit, and with a determination far beyond what was suspected to exist in his character, before the British Government had declared war on Germany, Borden had cabled to England the offer of Canada's entire coöperation in the event of a struggle. From that hour until the end of the war, through all the political vicissitudes that marked those four years, despite every adverse criticism that naturally arose, he never once wavered nor relinquished the helm. Others might hesitate, others might turn back, others might halt in presence of unforeseen obstacles; but he never once lost sight of the beacon on the far summit which he had set there for his own guidance and for the guidance of Canada.

This is not the time to attempt any appreciation of Sir Robert Borden's course and activities at the Peace Conference, nor their effect upon the decisions of the Allies or upon the prospects of Canada; we are yet too near those events to be able to judge them with impartiality or to gauge their ultimate bearing upon the near future of the Dominion. The student of the coming years will be better able to appraise them, and to assign to Sir Robert Borden the place which he must occupy in the Pantheon of Canadian statesmanship. For the present all that can be done is to express regret that the overstrain of duty has considerably, though not, it may be hoped, permanently, impaired his health and has led to an immediate retirement from public life. The consequences of his relinquishing the Premiership at this time and they will be many and great in Canada—are of minor consideration compared to the premature ending of a public career that, if slow in its earlier developments, certainly was marked by ability, energy, determination, patriotism, and worldwide sympathies.

Personally, Sir Robert Borden is a man of fine education, a very deep-read lawyer, possessing an even and cordial disposition, devoted to art, letters, and to warm human attachments. He has never been an extremist, either in politics or religion. He had his strong convictions, but he conceded the right to all his fellow-countrymen to enjoy their respective views and opinions. He had a great dislike for all that tended to awaken prejudices in the minds of the people. It was his misfortune, at times, to be under the necessity of surrounding himself with colleagues who did not fully share his broad-mindedness. In the last year but one of the war he made a stupendous effort to strengthen his ministry by inviting members of the Opposition to join him in his task. To a certain degree he succeeded; his course therein may be estimated in different ways, according as it is observed from one critical angle or from another, but it clearly demonstrated that he was not a hidebound politician.

The Present Situation in Alsace-Lorraine

To the Editors of THE REVIEW:

A few months ago I had the honor of being presented to Mr. Wilson. During the audience I asked the President to be kind enough to write his name on the margin of a volume where were formulated his Fourteen Points. Very obligingly the distinguished statesman penned his initials alongside of these words of the eighth point: "The wrong done to France in the matter of Alsace-Lorraine should be righted." Here again Mr. Wilson recognized the fact that the logical and just conclusion of the war could only be reached by restoring to France Alsace-Lorraine. The President, as well as the whole generous American nation, saw this from the first moment, and we shall always be eternally thankful to them for this.

When Germany annexed these Provinces, she never asked the population how they felt in the matter, nor did she pay any attention to the Bordeaux Protest of 1871. And, again, when in 1874 she then recently elected Alsace-Lorraine members of the Reichstag requested that the Provinces be given an opportunity to vote on the question, the proposal was greeted with derisive laughter. During the forty-four years which followed, the Germans constantly refused to sanction by a popular ballot what they held simply by the right of conquest. More than this—they never ceased to persecute the people of Alsace-Lorraine because the latter continued to protest against a domination forced upon them. But to-day, rather late it must be admitted, the authorities at Berlin are beginning to pronounce as stupid the policy of heartless repression which their predecessors pursued in the Provinces, and which conclusively showed that, after forty-four years of tranquil possession, Germany had not learned how to win the affection or even the esteem of this people who continued to repudiate their rule. Bismarck's remark was quite true, when he said, evidently with a feeling of pride, that "the Prussian does not know how to make himself liked." France, on the other hand, has always succeeded in awakening warm affection in those who have come to her, the latest proof of which was seen repeatedly in the recent war. Consequently it is not surprising that Alsace-Lorraine, torn by force from a nation to which she was so warmly attached, and placed under the domination of unsympathetic masters, has throughout this long exile always ardently desired to return to the land of her preference.

whether the Provinces, "momentarily absent from their home," were still faithful in their love for France. This questioning was largely due to a most active German propaganda which never wearied in spreading statements to this effect. But the events which quickly followed easily overturned this fragile edifice founded on falsehoods. When the French and American troops entered Alsace-Lorraine, they were welcomed, as I know from having seen it myself, with transports of joy by the whole population. When were more flags unfurled and garlands displayed by a people delirious with enthusiasm? How true were the words of President Poincaré pronounced at Strassburg: "The plebiscite has been taken!" Yes, it was taken, and how decisive and overwhelming it was. In a word, the Provinces threw themselves into the arms of France. The long martyrdom was at last at an end.

During the forty-four years of their servitude, the people of Alsace-Lorraine had never ceased to ask for autonomy within the German Empire. But to this very reasonable demand Berlin always replied with a No. So now these Germans, who imagine themselves shrewd, asked themselves if the moment had not come to satisfy this desire and so prevent the Provinces from becoming once more a part of France, "one and indivisible." A few days before the armistice, the Berlin Government appointed a Stadtholder and an Alsatian Secretary of State whose mission it was to elaborate, in accord with the Strassburg Parliament, a new and liberal constitution, even if it had to be republican. But these eleventh-hour concessions were outstripped by the onrush of events. If they had been offered before 1914, they might have satisfied the nation, but in 1918, an Alsace-Lorraine, sure of becoming a part of France again, would of course not listen to them. The Lower House at Strassburg overturned the new Government, declared itself a National Assembly and in a resolution which was carried unanimously stated that it was the wish of the people to return to France.

But even then the Germans did not abandon their efforts to prevent the disaster. An "emergency committee" was established at Baden-Baden, an unlimited amount of money was put at its disposal and Alsace-Lorraine was inundated with tracts, manifestoes and pamphlets, in which the neutralization plan was advocated. In the meantime France took possession of the country and at first acted very leniently towards these propagandists. Only Government employees who had compromised themselves were expelled, while 350,000 Germans, who were, of course, heart and soul with Germany, were left in the country. For a moment Berlin thought her efforts had been crowned with success. "We have triumphed," shouted the three musketeers of Baden-Baden. But they were destined to be disappointed. After a long period of tolerance, the Strassburg police decided one fine morning to take measures to check the chief "neutralists," and the agitation ceased without having affected even superficially the attachment of Alsace-Lorraine to France.

But during the first months of French rule some grave but inevitable mistakes were made. Though Alsatian administrative ways differ radically from those which prevail in other parts of France, the new French officials thoughtlessly began to substitute the latter for the former and consequently produced considerable discontent; whereupon the Germans imagined, mistakenly as was their custom, that this dissatisfaction was addressed to France, the Liberator, instead of to stupid officials who meant well but were blunderers. As soon as it was perceived at Paris that France was on the wrong track in Alsace-Lorraine, M. Clemenceau made haste to confide the administration of the Provinces to a first-class official, M. Alexandre Millerand, a leading member of the Paris bar, who had been associated with M. Clemenceau both as a journalist and a minister; and he also carried through the Chambers a bill which maintained provisionally in these territories the local self-government practices peculiar to them. These measures sufficed to quiet the public mind, which had been momentarily excited.

If Germany is still blind in this matter, her eyes must have been opened by the results of the general elections which occurred in the middle of last month, which, by the way, were favorable to the moderates, but in which even the socialists declared their satisfaction at becoming French once more. In this matter of nationality, and this is the point that especially interests me here, all the candidates stood on the same platform. Not one neutralist or autonomist showed himself on the hustings. M. Poincaré's remark was again to the point—"the plebiscite has been made." All the voters of Alsace-Lorraine approved the Treaty of Versailles, and Germany sees these Provinces permanently lost to her, for we are French and we shall remain French, under the protection of the powerful Allies of France, to whom we express, with all our heart, our profoundest gratitude.

“Vir Vere Christianus”

A LABRADOR DOCTOR. The Autobiography of Wilfred Thomason Grenfell, M.D. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company.

IF Wilfred Grenfell in the second year of his medical course had not turned into an Evangelistic meeting conducted by Moody and Sankey on a certain night in the year 1885, the whole course of his after life would have been different. He would have become a distinguished physician with an aristocratic connection. Wealth and honors would have been his; and he would have enjoyed the athletic outdoor sports, shooting, fishing, yachting so dear to the heart of the English gentleman. It would have been an exemplary and irreproachable career. But that night he made a choice as radical as Saul of Tarsus. It drove him to a life of hardship and service at the ends of the earth. Honor unsought has come to him in no stinted measure. More precious still must be the gratitude of the thousands into whose life he has brought healing and the admiration of troops of friends who know how to value a man and a man's work.

Now he has written his autobiography; but he tells us surprisingly little about himself. He belongs to the famous Cornwall Grenfells, a fighting clan whose record is writ large in the annals of England's army and fleet from the days of Elizabeth to the Great War just ended. A curious mark of the English aristocrat is that he not only meets danger adequately when it comes; he goes out of his way to seek it; he courts it like a mistress. The love of adventure is in the Grenfell blood. As a mere child, young Wilfred was allowed to roam at will upon the dangerous Sands of Dee with his gun, wild-fowling, and retrieving the birds he shot by swimming into the icy pools after them. Adventure has always been the breath of his nostrils. Whether it was fighting half a dozen blackguards who were trying to bully him in a “pub,” or manœuvring a capsized boat to land in the dark, or drifting with freezing hands and feet on an ice-pan in Arctic seas, peril to life and limb has always fired, not chilled, his ardent temperament. Christianity itself appeals to him as the greatest adventure of all.

Wilfred Thomason Grenfell was born at Parkgate, Chester, on February 28, 1865. His father was a brilliant graduate of Oxford, a clergyman and the head of an excellent private school. At the age of fourteen, young Grenfell was sent to Marlborough College; four years later he was ripe for the university, and was offered his choice of Oxford, or a medical course at London university. He chose the latter. At the age of twenty-one, he had satisfied the easy requirements of that time for a medical degree. In hospital he had seen much of the North Sea fishermen, and soon undertook medical, philanthropic, and religious work among them. At the suggestion of his chief, Sir Frederic Treves, he went to sea in January to take a look over his “field.” He found the twenty thousand men in England's fishing fleets of the breed of Peggotty and Ham. Their rough, hard life had plenty of surgical cases as by-products. Floating traders in liquor demoralized them in slack times of fishing. There was no attempt to relieve suffering or supply medical attendance. The amelioration Grenfell was able to bring into their lives can not easily be calculated. He does not mention it in his book, but his work among the North Sea fishermen was the subject of an admiring article by James Runciman in one of the leading reviews.

Soon he became interested in the condition of the fishermen of the North Atlantic, and in June, 1892, he and two others sailed a ketch with only three feet freeboard across to Newfoundland. They made St. Johns the very time of the third great fire. From that day to this, he has labored with the ardor of a zealot and the cool practicality of a common-sense Englishman to better the lot of perhaps the hardest-driven white population in the world. The fishermen of the Labrador wring a scanty living from the cruellest of seas. Starvation is never far away. They shelter in hovels to which an Irish peasant's cabin is luxurious. Till Grenfell came among them, there was absolutely no relief from disease. Yet they have all the primitive virtues; courage, daring, fortitude, resource are all in the day's work; mutual helpfulness is a matter of course; the hospitality of the poor, which means sharing the last crust, is “t' way of t' coast.” Having himself the qualities of the sailor, Grenfell was particularly fitted to deal with this race of seafarers. For twenty years, he has striven to better their conditions and afford them aid of every kind, medical, religious, educational. He has aimed at nothing less than the transformation of the entire population, to lift the whole dead weight to a higher level of civilization. Here in the United States he has found his most effective support, and has enlisted an army of generous helpers. It has not been all plain sailing. Losses, disappointments, failures have come with success; but the net result is incalculable improvement in the lot of a brave, hardy, laborious race. That such a work should ever be allowed to lapse is inconceivable.

Another philosopher descanting on “Varieties of Religious Experience” could draw a fresh illustration from this volume. He would find a case of “conversion,” as authentic as Bunyan's. He could point to a type of fervent evangelical Christianity coupled with an administrative ability which would have raised the possessor to eminence in the business world. He could show principle of the most uncompromising kind joined with a joy in living, a love of adventure, athletics, sport, and sheer fun, supposedly “pagan.” He could hardly find a better instance of practical religion, nearly creedless but concerned chiefly in following in the footsteps of the Teacher, who “went about doing good.”

The Work of an Interpreter

THE AMAZING CITY. By John F. Macdonald. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Co.

ALL one nation ever really knows of another is a caricature. To Americans, England is John Bull; to England, America is Uncle Sam. A common language and common institutions, backed by the most determined goodwill, cannot bridge the chasm of misunderstanding which yawns between these kindred peoples. Men of genius, like Emerson and Hawthorne, strove to interpret the English to Americans; and, in our own time, Price Collier built upon their classic foundations. But how slight is the result! Some progress towards mutual understanding was made during the great war; but already a reaction has set in. In the case of a country like France, with a different language and alien institutions, the difficulties of comprehension are doubled or trebled. In spite of America's gratitude to Lafayette, Rochambeau, and de Grasse, in spite of Pershing's epigram and the sincere and widespread sentiment it stood for, actual contact with the French and France left Americans considerably disillusioned.

It is perhaps the very difficulty of interpreting one nation to another which makes the task so attractive. There is certainly no lack of effort to break down the ethnic barriers which delay the march of mankind to the federation of the world. The latest and not least successful attempt to overcome racial prejudice is represented by this collection of John F. Macdonald's scattered papers, which have been edited by his widow. “The Amazing City” is Paris, and Paris is the heart of France. Macdonald's qualifications for the work were many: long residence in Paris, sympathy, fairness, patience, love of truth, the gift of style. A Scot is better fitted than an Englishman to understand the French. Scotland and France are old allies; and long-established intercourse between them has left its mark on the dialect.

Written at different times for different periodicals, these scattered papers are animated by a single purpose—“to counteract the wrong-headed reports of French and English antipathies by which two sympathetic neighbor-peoples are being estranged and exasperated." The author's sole aim is to report accurately what has come under his own eyes. Planless as the book may seem, it covers nearly all events in every domain of Parisian life between 1907 and 1913. Implicitly it contradicts the facile assumption that the war created a new, serious, earnest Paris. Paris is one and indivisible.

Perhaps the most illuminating paper of the collection is the account of Madame Steinheil's trial for the murder of her husband and her mother. From this side of the Atlantic the whole transaction was veiled in mystery; Macdonald's narrative lifts the veil. He was one of the favored few admitted to the court-room, and he takes the reader with him. There, in the prisoner's dock, is the "tragic widow," otherwise the "black panther," dressed in mourning. There is the "Judge," really the public prosecutor, accusing, bullying, torturing the wretched woman; and, at every fresh accusation, she leaps from her chair to deny it with a passion, a voice, and an energy that Bernhard might have envied. His account of Jules Guérin, the furious Anti-Semite propagandist, who edited his paper L'Anti-Juif in a study bristling with loaded revolvers—in La Ville Lumière, not the Texas or California of romantic fiction—is most picturesque and convincing. The defence of Fort Chabrol by this militant journalist in 1899 is like an episode in the wars of the Guelfs and the Ghibellines. For weeks he defied Paris, till level-headed Paris put a period to the siege and to him. And yet this ferocious editor, who wanted to hang the Jews at the lamp-posts, lost his life as a result of helping his neighbors in the Seine floods.

Equally brilliant is his characterization of Henri Rochefort. "It was only his snowy white hair, brushed upwards, that made him picturesque. Pale, steely blue eyes, that lit up cruelly, evilly at times; a face seamed, sallow, and horse-like in shape; a harsh, guttural voice; large, yellowish hands, with long, pointed finger-nails." When Macdonald went to interview him, he found him in dressing-gown and slippers, in his own apartment amidst pictures, flowers, and frail china. He was playing with a little toy lamb, which could be made to jump by pressing a bulb at the end of a rubber tube. Rochefort the terrible was all amiability. He complimented his visitor on his unlikeness to the traditional Englishman of French caricatures, saw him to the garden gate, and plucked a rose for him. In his very next article, Rochefort described Macdonald as a "sinister brigand in the pay of the Jews; in fact, one of those diabolical bandits who are devastating our beloved France." Rochefort was, indeed, "a mass of contradictions."

The same man, who, as a medical student, denounced the iniquities of vivisection, demanded that walnut-shells containing long, hairy spiders should be strapped on Captain Dreyfus' eyes.

All Paris passes in review through these pages. The life of the streets, underground shops where worn-out finery is exposed for sale, picnics of the honest "cits," the strike of the electricians, the comedy and tragedy of the Latin Quarter, royal visits to Paris, the peculiarities of French Presidents, are a few of the themes treated with singular point and breadth. The section devoted to explaining Bourget's dramatic activity and the French attitude towards such plays as "Notre Jeunesse" and "La Déserteuse," is particularly helpful to the bewildered outsider. Macdonald was among the fortunate beings who actually witnessed the first performance of "Chantecler." His descriptive interpretation would almost persuade the sympathetic reader that he too was present at that gallant and spirit-moving play.

Macdonald is an accomplished craftsman. He has drawn his pictures with his eye on the object, his hand is restrained by Scottish fear of excess, and he has learned not a little from the masters of French prose. Though he treats topics of the day, his method is not ephemeral. It must be a very subtle critic who can distinguish journalism of this type from literature. The general reader will be eager to know the other two works on the same theme by an observer so just and so sincere.

National "Atmosphere"

RACE AND NATIONALITY. By John Oakesmith. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Company.

THE question of race and nationality is indeed as delicate as any question now confronting mankind. On what basis shall the world be recast—of race or nationality or internationalism? This question can be answered—if indeed any answer is possible—only by first defining these three terms. The meaning attached to them in the past has been vague. Men have grouped themselves instinctively, and, so far as can be judged, for the most part advantageously. Can better results be expected in the future from factitious modifications of the grouping achieved in the past? Can group determinations be regulated, and in case of fancied need prohibited, as public utilities are regulated or liquor prohibited? Is the science of community formation and development sufficiently exact to speak with an authoritative voice; in short, have we sufficiently analyzed the concepts "race," "nationality," "internationalism" to know their meanings?

In "Race and Nationality" Mr. John

Oakesmith attempts to discover the most pregnant fact of modern political evolution. The book, though appearing only recently, was written as a whole before the war broke out, and the author says that if he had been one of those "who foresaw the early outbreak of a universal war in which the triumph or defeat of the principle of nationality was to be the dominating issue, his treatment of the subject would probably have been wanting in a certain boldness which perhaps now marks it, even if he had had the courage to enter upon it at all." It is this boldness that gives the work its character. "The principle of nationality has defied definition and even analysis," said J. A. R. Marriott more than two years ago. Yet the task is inviting and largely because in the past it has not been undertaken in a genuine scientific spirit. Nothing could be more true than a statement which Lord Esher made in 1918, in a letter on "The Meaning of Patriotism": "With a new world opening before us, it is just the moment to take stock of words and phrases in common use, and to give them precision and directness." This is Mr. Oakesmith's aim, the sub-title of his work being "An Inquiry into the Origin and Growth of Patriotism."

We are habituated to the idea that blood is thicker than water. No one, however, can read the work before us without a suspicion that atmosphere is of more account than blood in the development of nationality and patriotism. The author, dissenting from Chamberlain's conception of race and Robertson's deduction of internationalism, adheres to the notion of nationality, which he defines, in a phrase of his own coining, as the principle of "organic continuity of common interest." If at the start this sounds like catchwords, we speedily discover that the expression epitomizes a clearly defined, admirably conceived, and forcibly presented philosophy of political evolution, in the light of which manifold problems occasioned by the war may be profitably studied.

Mr. Oakesmith's formula has three terms which require preliminary definition. First, Interest. By this is not meant interest in the purely personal and selfish sense. The interests of a man are everything in which he is interested: his physical, intellectual, moral, and artistic powers and all their manifold activities in the sphere of human life. The common interests of a group of people are their common material, intellectual, moral, and artistic possessions, their social institutions and their economic relations, and their common sympathy in the proper use of these in the world of experience. Secondly: There is not only community of interest, but continuity of interest. The forces which mould nationality, if there be any such thing as nationality, are of necessity historical forces, since every generation is the inheritor of the social tradition and culture of its predecessor, however much it may modify or improve the heritage before handing it down to its successor. Neither Rome nor any other nation was built in a day. National sympathy looks backward and forward as well as to the immediate present. The natural qualities possessed by all men, as men, are manifested quite differently in different communities, according to the special tradition or culture which has been gradually formed through generations of continuous national existence. But not only is nationality based on common interest; and on continuity of common interest: the continuity of interest is, thirdly, organic. That is to say, nationality, like every other evolutionary organism, has developed machinery for entering into relationships of action and passion with its environment; and, being a human organism, it is endowed, as part of that machinery, with intelligence, the last fine product of natural evolution, which is capable of diverting the lower forces of natural evolution to its own special human purposes. Under the pressure of surrounding phenomena, this organizing intelligence has developed a powerful and elaborate apparatus for the accomplishment of distinctively national ends. Nationality, therefore, is community of interest developed in course of time into a characteristic traditional culture which gradually creates for itself machinery, legislative, administrative, and other, for effecting its ends in the world of human action. Nationality, to repeat, is the organic continuity of common interest.

But an organism is not only an active phenomenon—it is capable not only of effecting its purposes, more or less successfully, in the external world, but it is the objective recipient of influences from all the external world. Mr. Oakesmith has not omitted, in its proper place, to deal with the possibility of a progressive national development in communities isolated from foreign influences; but he has not been able to ignore the fact that a main agent of national development, paradoxical as the statement may appear, is to be found in the operation of external causes; not as forces dominating the national organism—for how in such a case could nationality exist?—but as moulding and being moulded by the national forces in a cooperative movement. The phrase which is suggested by the author to describe this process is, "The commingling of atmospheres." He errs in thinking that it may be a clumsy phrase; on the contrary, it is singularly felicitous.

critical examination of the contradictions and absurdities involved in the racial theories current in historical and political writers of the present day. The essence of the racial theory, especially as exhibited by writers of the school of Houston Stewart Chamberlain, is, we are told, profoundly immoral, as well as unnatural and irrational. It asserts that, by virtue of belonging to a certain "race," every individual member of it possesses qualities which inevitably destine him to the realization of certain ends. This conception has been the root-cause of that diseased national egotism whose exhibition during the war has been at once the scorn and the horror of the civilized world.

The view advocated by Mr. Oakesmith is that "race" as a constituent element in nationality is a purely subjective emotion. It is not an hereditary force, as is proved by the fact that strangers admitted into the bosom of a community soon participate in all the emotions of patriotic interest felt by the native inhabitants. The practical value of "race" is as purely subjective as the emotion of the soldier who is proud of his regiment's history, not because he is descended from its earliest members, but because he feels that he belongs to the same regiment as they did; organic community of common interest is the basis of the life of a regiment, as of all forms of social development. "Community of race" obtains its force, not from any objective value as a scientific factor in national life, but from the fact that it is a belief imbibed from so many sentimental sources in history, literature, and tradition. Race as an ideal conception has become part of an envioning tradition that moulds national character. The belief in it as an objective influence transmitted in the blood is an interesting but perverted recognition of continuity of common interest as an effective force that produces nationality. The danger is that it should be perverted so as to endeavor to force into common national organizations peoples claimed as belonging to the same race, but separated by different institutions, different laws and customs, different hopes and fears, different sympathies, and different hatreds. One sees the force of this last statement the moment one turns one's eyes to the Balkans.

Of course this whole discussion relates itself to the war and to post-war conditions; it is largely that fact that gives it its value. The two concluding chapters, in particular, deal with such pressing modern problems as the relationship of nationality to peace and war and to the League of Nations. It is here suggested that war will be made impossible, and universal and lasting peace be secured, not by the sudden imposition of hastily manufactured machinery, but by the gradual extension from national life to international life of the principle of organic community of interest which has already established harmony within the separate national boundaries. Is not this, however, what we all fondly supposed up to the middle of 1914?

The Note of Yesterday

SIR HARRY: A LOVE STORY. By Archibald Marshall. New York: Dodd, Mead and Company.

CONSEQUENCES. By E. M. Delafield. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.

MR. MARSHALL, according to the publisher, thinks this the best novel he has written. History indicates that it is as idle to reason why in such case as in the case of the cat and her favorite kitten. The chronicler tries here to slip out of his Trollopean mantle and to prophesy of another world. He does what various admirers have been asking him to do and—well, they asked for it! The imagination of most artists under the highest rank (and of some in it) of narrow habitat. A place, a time, an atmosphere—it is there they chiefly live; elsewhere they are little more at ease than the rest of us. The comfortable England of County society, the England of safe privilege and apparently unshakable class divisions, the England of property as vested in her gentry, is the home of Mr. Marshall's fancy. In his Preface to "Abington Abbey" (or was it "The Graftons"?) published in war-time, he showed a little uneasiness about his continued treatment of that old settled England now so patently breaking up. His defence, as we recall it, was that the present is too close and confused for interpretation, that it is a useful solace to glance back, out of our turmoil, to those untroubled days and ways, and that there, at all events, his own field lay. Now, in stepping from it, or in swinging its gate open to the present, he finds himself confronted by a choice. Two unfamiliar paths lie before him: the turbulent road of social and political change, along which he and his gentlefolk must be sadly jostled and may be put altogether out of countenance, and (close alongside and changeless and in its way safe) the flowery way of emotional romance. His subtitle is the rose he wears in his coat as symbol of his choice.

We are to take that step with him, for the opening of the story finds us strolling in the old plaisance, with the old companions. Royd Castle with its young heir, its stately dowager, its old family servants, its satelitte vicar and tutor, its supremely complacent snob-bishness and reclusion—all this exhales the atmosphere in which Mr. Marshall, like his master, has seemed to breathe most contentedly, but something uncommon is up. The young heir, fruit of a misalliance, is carefully reared at home by the dowager-grandmother. He comes to the verge of manhood a child-hearted dreamer. At the fit hour, arrives his meeting with the maid who though apparently of low degree is as beautiful and as miraculously innocent as himself. Ferdinand and Miranda, Richard and Lucy—to such a plane, from his well-bred country-house wooings of the past, Mr. Marshall essays to rise. Perhaps the first and last word is that we feel it to be an essay: "The melting sweetness of her gaze filled him with trembling rapture. The secret of life and all its beauty, which he thought he had divined, now seemed to have depths beyond depths of meaning. . . ." There is much of this, the real old story, eloquently told; brought to us, however, as a familiar thing and not as in any way a revelation. And with the first idyllic episode, we have had the best of it. Thereafter the plot develops a strained mechanism such as serves the craft of a Stephen McKenna or a Mrs. Victor Rickard. Sir Henry goes to war and learns the brutality of life, and returns to marry a Viola who turns out to be of as good blood as his own—the County touch thus proving too strong for our author, after all.

"Consequences" returns to the period and the materials of "Zella Sees Herself." After the somewhat tedious brilliancy of "The Pelicans," it is honest reading. But in the end we seem to have been spending our time over a sort of inferior and hopeless "Zella." Alex Clare has the restless self-consciousness, the awkward egotism, the pathetic longing for recognition and love, that belonged to Zella. But she is not destined, like Zella, to see herself to any purpose, so far as either her happiness or her usefulness is concerned. It is the piteous story of a human failure too drab to be tragic. Interwoven with it is that element of conventual routine, religious ardor and repression, dogma and comedy, which is so prominent in this writer's earlier stories. An autobiographical foundation for this guesses itself . . . Alex's lack of charm belongs to her lack of self-respect; she affronts love by grovelling for it, and there is nothing in life for her but humiliation and suffering. Her only act of strength is the act of self-destruction which rids the world of her encumbering presence. Alex, we may say, might have found work and some sort of happiness in the enlarged sphere for woman of our own day. But in no world, however ideal, could there be much need of Alexes.

There is a vague aroma of Miss Austen and the Brontës about these novels of "E. M. Delafeld." Lucas Malet's flavor is more "mid-Victorian." A crude suggestion of her style would be as a blend of George Eliot and Henry James —which is a sufficiently quaint attribution for the daughter of Charles Kingsley! The tale is very long and, to put it with mildness, leisurely beyond all requirements. There is a comparatively simple story to be told about a nice English girl and her parentage, and her home, and her love-affairs, and the Voice that Breathes over her and her elderly Colonel Sahib in the end. But it is elaborated and embroidered to the length of five hundred black pages. The dialogue is often ponderous beyond belief. The medical pundit who prescribes for General Frayling is by no means a "character" part. He speaks the tongue of his book-mates: "The medical properties of the springs—particularly those of La Nonnette—meet our patient's case excellently. . . . I have reason to know that other agreeable people are going to Cotteret shortly. Not the rank and file. For such the place does not pretend to cater. There the lucrative stock-broker, or lucrative Jew, is still a rara avis. Long may he continue to be so, and Cotteret continue to pride itself on its exclusiveness! 'In that particular it will admirably suit you, Mrs. Frayling.' . . . To a compliment so nicely turned," the narrative proceeds, "Henrietta could not remain insensible. Before the destined train bore Dr. Stewart-Walker back to his more legitimate zone of practice, she saw herself committed to an early striking of camp, with this obscure, if select, ville d'eaux as her destination."

Already someone has compared this story and De Morgan's narratives; but its total lack of humor puts it upon quite another plane. One must take its involved trivialities as seriously as they take themselves. It is for the more abandoned addicts of the Victorian Nephenthe.

An Original Novel of Old Cairo

ALBERT ADES and Albert Josipovici are fortunate indeed! Maeterlinck considered their last book, "Les Inquiets," the most remarkable literary début of the day; and Mirbeau, commenting on the manuscript of their new work, proclaimed it "une des plus grandioses manifestations de la pensée!" This is high praise for Adès and Josipovici; it is less flattering for literature and thought. We must surely have fallen upon evil times if the mind has produced nothing more "grandiose" than "Le Livre de Goha le Simple."

I do not mean, however, that this is not a good book; it is well written and entertaining; and it gives us something new in the exotic novel of recent years. Other writers, such as Loti, Mille, and the Tharauds, have written of Mohammedan civilization; but these authors are Frenchmen; and whether they are flooded with emotion by the muezzin's call to prayer as it sifts down upon the harems of old Stamboul, or smile at the founding of a shrine over the body of a dead donkey, or, yet again, are puzzled by the ideals of a people whose prophet announced his love of women, perfume, and prayer, they all look upon the Mohammedan world as foreigners, from the outside. Adès and Josipovici are Egyptians, writing of old Cairo as natives, from the inside; and although I feel by no means sure that their Western training has not influenced their ideas, their attitude has lent a certain originality to their book.

A father exercises the right to put his daughter to death for conjugal infidelity, students kiss the hands of their teacher as he goes through the streets, a vulture steals meat from a vendor's tray, a go-between is the agent of a perfectly respectable citizen, a spirit is supposed to have strangled a woman—these things, as well as many other matters of daily life, custom, or belief, the authors take for granted, using them, incidentally and without emphasis, as pertinent accessories to their story. Similarly they take for granted also, as men treating of familiar things, the characters of their heroes. Thus, instead of the usual generalizing and desultory glimpses at Mohammedan peculiarities, "Goha le Simple" gives us the pleasure of a novelty; a book of the East dealing solely with the steady, continuous development of two main characters.

Cheik-el-Zaki is a learned expounder of the Koran. About his column in the El-Azhar court gather the élite of Mohammedan youth; "their long necks are marked with heavy veins, their shoulders are narrow and angular, their fingers, tapering." But El-Zaki is not happy. He is tired of fighting the opposition of those who maintain unchanged the traditional doctrines of Islam. He turns for satisfaction to the realities of life and thus it is that he descends from the intellectual to the material and the instinctive; and thus it is also that his path crosses that of Goha who is progressing in the opposite direction.

The development of Goha is from our point of view more striking. The Mohammedans have, so the Tharauds tell us, a certain religious veneration for the half-witted; if the innocent and feeble-minded are different from us, it is because Allah has withheld a part of their brains in order that he may keep in secret communication with them. Goha's cerebral deficiency meets with more than Christian charity from El-Zaki, from his nurse Hawa, from El-Zaki's disquieting second wife, Nour-el-Ein, and from the widow who at the end of the story is smitten with his person as he passes stark naked under her window!

Goha has his trials, however, and they are bitter. At the age of twenty-two, he has the mentality of a child of twelve. As the result of the favor or favors (according to the sex) of the persons just mentioned and also because of his interest in a newly unearthed statue of Isis, found as he wandered idly one day on the further bank of the Nile, a change takes place gradually within him. His sensibilities are awakened, and with their awakening has dawned upon his clouded but iridescent consciousness a sense of his own person. His mind is, to be sure, scarcely more lucid now than formerly; witness the following passage representing the accumulated fruits of many experiences:

The genie that walks with beings (the shadow), I see it and no one else sees it. I know how men are steeped in oil, I have heard it with my own ears. I know how beans are bartered for sheep and if any one wants to learn, it is to me that he must come. I have seen negresses become white at night, I have seen the desert change into precious stones, and stars fall down upon the djinns.

His life has supplied him with nothing but sensations, images, and desires; but these have been sufficient to impress him with the reality of man as a living being and his heart swells with tenderness towards every one—yes, even towards Sayed, the orange vendor who with the children, the merchants, and the hetaerae has mocked him most cruelly in the public streets. Unfortunately with the capacity for affection has come also an awakening to suffering. Goha is soon bereft of all that he most cherished and all those who have been good to him are pursued, so it seems to him, by a malevolent Fate. A great, compelling revolt slowly rises within him and when at last he leaves the city to wander fasting in the desert, there is blood, the blood of his own child, upon his hands.

It is an act of kindness that restores him to his former composure. El-Zaki receives him in his house; feeds, clothes, and rests him; and it is as he leaves the savant that the widowed but unconsolated Nazli-Hamen offers him marriage, a home, and wealth.

Goha paused. His eyes filled with dreams. The feeling that had budded within him out there under the tamarisks of Gezira and which had blossomed at the warm touch of Nour-el-Ein, now fell upon the woman before him. Like three villages along a river bank, the figures of the goddess, of the daughter of Melek (Nour-el-Ein) and of Nazli stood beside the course of his single and ever-growing love. . . . Nazli's voice was sweet as honey, her skin was white as the lily floating upon the water between two green leaves. As he listened, and looked at her, Goha felt that something was altered within him. He had a desire for calm. He had become a man.

Is it surprising that he accepted the good things offered him?

From a material point of view, the troubles of Goha have not, in my opinion, come to an end. I have grave misgivings, for instance, as to his ability to handle the business affairs which Nazli means to entrust to his care. But when dealing with a civilization in which facts themselves, or so it seems, are successfully poised upon the fumes of reverie, why not end with an optimistic absurdity? Adès and Josipovici, as their style and language show, have learned many things from the French; no one can deny their right to subtle irony. After all, the merit of their life of Goha le Simple lies primarily in its suggestion of human truth; and "qui de nous," if I may be allowed to twist a familiar saying of the tongue they know so well, "qui de nous n'a son grain de—Goha?"

THE Index of the Review for the issues from May 17 to December 27 will accompany the issue of January 3.

DR. PAGET TOYNBEE'S "Supplement to the Letters of Horace Walpole" (Oxford University Press) contains 258 letters (or parts of letters). Of these, 110 are now printed for the first time, twenty-three are now first printed in full, and 125 are reprinted from various sources, some of which have only recently become available." The object, apparently, is to place all the discoverable correspondence within the hands of anybody who owns both the Toynbee edition and the "Supplement." The new material is of interest, and the new editor has done his duty with a conscientiousness which, like conscience in so many aspects, is admirable and formidable. His notes are judicious, but he should not have interrupted and disfigured the text of the letters in Volume I by untimely and unlovely references to additions and corrections in the second volume.

Horace Walpole remains a sort of mystery, though a mystery in his comfortable, sociable disposition seems about as misplaced as a Gothic castle on Strawberry Hill. The reader says peevishly to Horace: "What right have you to puzzle me?" To which Walpole would doubtless answer: "None whatever, my dear Sir. I beg you to forgive the indiscretion." And the mystery would tantalizingly reassert itself in the inconclusiveness of that urbane reply. What is there to explain in an agreeable, harmless gentleman who gave himself to the collection of rarities in marble or bronze or black-letter and to the composition of letters in which rarities in fact or hearsay were similarly enshrined? The trouble may lie in the fact that Horace's mind was larger than its quarters, yet why larger or how much larger, it is very difficult to say. He curls himself up, if the expression may be risked, with the utmost complacency in his narrow room, and we are perversely vexed with him for not being uncomfortable.

Walpole himself modestly calls his collections "a baby-house full of playthings for my second childhood" (II, 40). He is equally humble about his "shallow literary mint" (id.). He is variously amiable. He had not only the art of obliging, but the art of being obliged, so often the subtlest form of obliging. His concern for Horace Mann's health is almost tender. When a poor man in Venice is beheaded for stealing a cup from a church, he can "not sleep for thinking of the unhappy creature" (I, 38). He calls a worthy man of mean birth "one of the plainest simple good men you ever saw" (II, 33), a phrase which embellishes Horace more than his earldom. The latest letters are particularly engaging. As an exhibit of feeling they are perfect, but it occurs to the reader that, if they were less perfect as exhibit, they might be more satisfying as evidence. The innuendo is shabby, yet such innuendoes are the vengeance which the mind instinctively takes on a man whom lovable traits do not render lovable.

The venerable Henry Vignaud, the Columbus scholar and probably the doyen of the American diplomatic service, writes in a recent letter from his home near Paris:

My physical infirmities are such that I cannot go out and so I live confined in my library, where I am engaged on a most important work for which I have been collecting notes and documents for many years. It is a Historical and Critical Catalogue of all the old maps, showing the gradual progress of the discovery of the world from the mention of Paradise, in the Bible, to 1600. It will be the work of my life, and as it is nearly finished I hope to put it through before I pass away, which may happen at any time, as I am now ninety! Though I am disabled physically, fortunately, I don't feel any depression intellectually, and I can work all day. Perhaps I may add that I was recently elected membre correspondant de l'Institut, a very distinguished honor, and that my last work, "Vespuccius," was given a prize by the Institut.

In recognition of what he has done for the Allies, M. Joseph Iorga, professor of history at the University of Bucharest, Rumania, was recently made a commander of the French Legion of Honor. M. Iorga is also a member of the Rumanian Academy and of Parliament. During the war he brought out at Jassy a daily newspaper which vigorously opposed German interests, and two pamphlets—"Histoire des Relations Anglo-Roumaines" and "Relations des Roumaines avec les Alliés." Both the journal and the pamphlets were written in French, "which well illustrates," he wrote recently, "the important rôle which the French language and literature play outside of France. The new Balkan literature, like that of modern Greece, which is a creation of the eighteenth century and exercises an influence not limited to the Greek people, owes much to the classical literature of France. The young Serbian literature, however, has been more influenced by German letters, while Bulgarian writers are little else than popularizers, and have come on the scene at a much more recent date. The French romantic movement gave an impulsion to the new school of Rumanian poetry, which, however, was from the very start subjected to influences of a native popular nature. About the year 1870 French influence weakened in our country, but only to start up again with renewed force recently in certain circles."

In Partibus Infidelium

MY friends wonder why I should choose to live in Japan—a trip is another matter. I wonder at those maps. Maps of South America, of course. Almost every New York business man on whom I call seems to have a map of South America below the glass top of his desk or hung kakemono-like behind his arm-chair.

The map attracts my attention because I want to talk to him about Asia. When I point out with the deference due from a literary man speaking to a business man on a business matter that, if it's customers he is after, there are twenty times more Asiatics than South Americans, that in fact there are nearly twice as many people under the flag of Japan as in South America, he will say in a final manner, "But the buying power, my boy, the buying power." "On the contrary," I reply, "last year, an exceptional year no doubt, the trade between America and Asia was worth something like $400,000,000 more than the trade with South America, and every working day of the year there are four and a half million dollars worth of goods crossing the Pacific between the United States and Asia." "Devote yourself to South America in reason, of course," I go on, "but, after all, Asia exists." The other day when I met an executive who had no map of South America I was so surprised that I asked what he meant by it. He said that his firm had been working in South America for thirty years and had done more business in Asia in ten. He might have added "and without any bother of translations into Spanish and Portuguese." English carries practically everywhere in Asia. I know, because when I started a periodical in Japan I imagined it to be necessary to run thirty pages of Japanese. I soon dropped them. The head of every firm in the Orient worth reaching or some of his assistants can read enough English to read an advertisement. English, as Japanese keep saying, is the second language of Japan. And what language can compete with English in China, let alone India, the Philippines, and Malaya?

But about my going to live in Japan and returning—at 54—to the journalism from which I had escaped. I can only ask whether it is not important both to the Orient and the Occident that there should be an attempt to perform for the East the duty which the great monthlies of America, England, and France perform for their peoples and those who are interested in them? The last great review which remains to be founded in the world is an Asiatic review, for in the largest and most populated continent there is the last great unoccupied field. The political, moral, and mercantile possibilities of Asia stir the imagination, excite the sympathy, and arouse the anxiety of a few students and of the statesmen who understand that nowhere in the world has the war had more far-reaching results than in Asia.

The historian of the future will say that there was not in our times any duty more pressing than the duty of bringing about a better interpretation of the East to the West, and of the West to the East. The barrier between East and West is the more grave because the physical barrier is breaking down so much more quickly than the mental. Within five years, air communication between Europe and Asia, America and Asia, Australia and Asia, and to and from the different parts of Asia will be a commonplace. But merely to land in other countries is not to understand them. Thousands of people visit Asia, but to their mentality little of the spirit of Asia penetrates. We know the cocksure talk on steamships and the bromidic authorship which has worse confounded the confusion of mind which exists about the East. And the knowledge of the West which the East has so laboriously, so pitifully obtained for itself is in a very large degree merely the knowledge which makes it possible to walk on ground so full of unsuspected holes as to threaten disaster all the time. The real barrier between the East and the West is a distrust of each other's morality and the delusion that the distrust is on one side only. How shall it be broken down?

"It is not by wounding prejudices," writes John Fiske, "that the cause of truth is most efficiently served. Men do not give up their false or inadequate beliefs by hearing them harshly criticised: they give them up only when they have been taught truths with which the false or inadequate beliefs are incompatible. The objects of the scientific, therefore, will be to extend the boundaries of knowledge." The boundaries of the knowledge of the West about the East and of the East about the West can be extended most practically by the publication in Asia of an authoritative, outspoken, incorruptible, readable, and comely review, which shall reflect to the East the best in the traditions, the ideals, and the practice of the West; and, by its abundant sympathy with and studious attitude of mind towards the Continent which rocked the cradle of the world and taught it all its faiths, shall unveil the thinking and the hopes of the Asiatic peoples and set forth their achievement and their circumstances, at once pathetic and heroic, depressing and stimulating.

"Nobody beginning," says Pepys in one of his immortal passages, "I did." Brought into journalism by that arch-predicating friar of the profession, W. T. Stead, I devoted myself ardently in my younger days to the popularizing of foreign and colonial politics. My first leader in a London daily was about Korea, my first book a plea for a better understanding of China. When Liberal Imperialism culminated in the disillusionment of the Boer war, the Quaker upbringing got uppermost and I fled from Fleet Street to Arcady and preached in the Quarterly, the Nineteenth Century, and the Times, in a serial article which ran through one of the monthlies for twelve years without a break, and in eight or nine books, that not oversea alone but in a healthy and prosperous countryside was the strength of the commonwealth. At the outbreak of the war I was in Japan trying to write (at a cost of ten times more than I should get for it) a book which should not only picture accurately the amazing peasant proprietary system of the Far East but get it into the mind of Anglo-Saxondom that in dealing politically with Japan, for example, we were dealing with a people who were, four out of five, on the land and only incidentally militarists and "curio" collectors.

But when in 1916 the Japanese exhibited a natural unacquaintance with the rights and wrongs of a war at the other end of the earth, the habits of my working life asserted themselves. I fell to war pamphleteering and published two books in Japanese. Eventually I produced a periodical. In the last issues of that temporary publication there were six pages of extracts from letters from every part of Asia—Nepal, the Shan States, and Java, for instance—regretting the stoppage of a monthly which had had some measure of success in making the problems and the life of the Far East interesting and vital. That and the confidence of Far Eastern notables that had been gained were pleasant enough, but offers of capital from five nationalities in order to found a review for the whole of Asia, which should be written in Asia and in considerable measure by Asiatics, were much more arresting.

It is idle to pretend that, profound though his interest in Asia may be, life in Japan is not exile for the Western man, much more the Western woman. Existence in New York is a good thing. Fresh books and access to the press of the world, the kindly intercourse of the clubs, the invigoration one seems to get from being whizzed to thirtieth and fortieth stories and lunching with aeroplane views, the accessibility and informality of the master workers, the brisk, decisive way in which things are done, the feel of democracy which, however perverted in some of its phases, is real and refreshing; the friendship of free-women, the pictures, the music, and from time to time the drama, not to speak of days and nights passed on a rock surrounded by the ocean water and open to its breezes—these indeed "is goot gifts." Here—was the phrase Emerson's or Holmes'—here one's top hums. Here, back once more from the Orient, one may say thankfully, "life is sweet, brother."

But "the signification of this gift of life, that we should leave a better world for our successors, is being understood, as Meredith said. One must do one's bit. And what is the use of spending a lifetime to learn a craft and then, as the old farmer said to me of his farming—he was seventy!—"leaving it just as one seems to have got the knack"?

The situation is grave in the Far East and not only in the Far East but throughout Asia. A little careful and patient labor in the work of mutual interpretation may help to avoid a great conflagration on which, if it be allowed to happen, another Lord Haldane may write, as the British ex-Lord Chancellor writes in that fine article in the Atlantic—I have merely substituted dots for "Germany" and "Germans" and inserted the word "Asia" for the word "world":

There is room for reproach to us Anglo-Saxons . . . was quite intelligent enough to listen to reason and besides, she had the prospect of becoming the dominating industrial and commercial power in Asia by dint merely of peaceful penetration. It is possible that, if her relations with her Western neighbors had been more intimate, she might have been saved from a great blunder. Her hubris was in part, at all events, the result of ignorance. Neither did we know enough of the . . . nor did the . . . know enough about us. And they realized little how tremendously great moral issues could stir and unite democracies. We, on the other hand, knew almost nothing of their tradition, their literature or their philosophy. We were deficient in "the international mind." A sustained and strenuous search after fuller mutual knowledge was required.

Drama

John Drinkwater's "Abraham Lincoln"

ABRAHAM LINCOLN: A PLAY. By John Drinkwater. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company. First representation in America at the Cort Theatre, Dec. 15, 1919.

JOHN DRINKWATER, in his "Abraham Lincoln," has written a play of great ability, of a daring straightforwardness, and of a rare and moving sincerity, which all but raises it to the level of its theme. The form is chronicle-play, but a chronicle-play so altered from its Elizabethan type that it is character, not events, which supplies the motive and receives the stress. Fiction dealing with certified events—events brought to its door by history—is in the equivocal and harassing position of a man disciplining his neighbor's unruly children. In character the materials are more tractable, and in "Abraham Lincoln" John Drinkwater is after a character and nothing else. His art is sound, and its delicacy is evinced in the scope and daring of its relinquishments. Where events are not architecture but portraiture, there is no harm in their want of logical coherence. Wisdom is further shown in the centralization of interest in one figure. Lincoln is all-in-all; other persons are suitably distinguished, but also suitably diminished, in portrayal. Shakespeare's "Henry IV," a chronicle-play of mixed type, is momentous and memorable on the side of characterization. But "Henry IV" as fabric is clumsy, because its great characters are not one, but several; and, speaking broadly, as one must when one speaks briefly, the only thing that can unify several characters is a plot. Mr. Drinkwater's is the sounder method.

I delight in plots myself, and their departure in a body from the stage would leave me inconsolable; but there is something that astonishes, that almost disconcerts, in the extent to which in this play problems are simplified, mistakes diminished, and difficulties avoided by the simple expedient of throwing plot overboard. A good play, with a plot on its hands, blunders almost inevitably; in this play there are practically no blunders. So naturally do difficulties and the mistakes which are their offspring arise from the imposition on the copy of life of a structure that is foreign to life itself. The critic finds himself inactive, finds himself superfluous, in the face of Mr. Drinkwater's equable and serene, though firm and vigorous, pursuit of the exposition of a character. The play would not succeed without Lincoln; it would not succeed without Drinkwater; but, given Lincoln and Drinkwater, it has the effect of writing itself. The main events, the announcement of Lincoln's nomination, a conference on Sumter, an afternoon tea, a conference on emancipation, a visit of Lincoln to Appomattox, his assassination in the theatre, are timed and spaced with an address in which history, obliging for once, has acted as collaborator and prompter.

The moderation of the portrayal is astonishing. To the strong superficial appeals in Lincoln's character the response of Mr. Drinkwater is tepid or wanting. We see little of the obvious contrasts between humor and melancholy, between statesmanship and rail-splitting, between the elastic policy and the granite will. Even the physique is not stressed. Mr. Drinkwater has the presumption to think that the supreme question about a man on whom a nation leaned in its hour of anguish is not whether his inches outran the normal measure or whether his figure would have satisfied Praxiteles. The author is peculiar in his indifference to peculiarity. Lincoln wears a greenish and crumpled hat in the excellent first act, and is permitted to say of the self-respecting Susan: "May the devil smudge that girl." This sounds auspicious, but Mr. Drinkwater's Abraham is so hopelessly, so brazenly, a gentleman that the author soon ceases to bother with the pretence that he is anything else. Lincoln is for Mr. Drinkwater primarily the man who reached greatness by referring all questions in entire simplicity to his own mind and conscience, and by referring his own answers, in equal simplicity, to the mind and conscience of his fellow-man. Jesus or Socrates could not have found a more obvious path to the extraordinary. Last of all, psychology is not conspicuous; Lincoln is seen mostly on official or social occasions which commonly trammel the psychologist by their dingy or dazzling opacity. His talk is characteristic, copious, and flawless in the modeling of its phrases. Its continuity in perfection is possibly a little overdone; nature rarely permits a chiseled style to be fluid.

So much for the book. The performance at the Cort was received with acclamations by the New York press, and in the region of the house where I sat the public did not measure its superlatives. This lays upon me two duties: First, to record that unanimity, as a protection to my readers; second, to express as trenchantly as I can the grounds for my dissent from that opinion. I thought it a performance without light, without understanding. Failure, of course, was difficult; the producer and the actors very nearly surmounted that difficulty. They did not quite surmount it; effects would creep in, leak in, as it were, in spite of the most scrupulous endeavors to keep the drama water-tight. The so-called "chronicler" was no bad speaker, but in six fatiguing recitations he enforced and reënforced his superfluity. Mr. Frank McGlynn's Lincoln may be defined thus. There are three Lincolns. The historical Lincoln was a deep man with superficial pungencies—grotesqueries and whimsicalities. Mr. Drinkwater's Lincoln retained the depths, but discarded the pungencies. Mr. McGlynn's Lincoln removed the depths without restoring the pungencies. There is no more savor, no more resin, in his Lincoln than in Mr. Drinkwater's, and there is far less reality and force. His physique is his strong point, he is best when he trusts to its support. In his energy he is sophomorical; in quietness he is acceptable; in silence he is occasionally impressive. His memory is stored with the facile climaxes of the high-school declamation platform, and the freedom with which he scatters these juvenilities over Lincoln's talk is suicidal. He makes Lincoln emotional in a business conversation with a messenger; he makes Lincoln imperious to Hay. These two flagrancies are not two minutes apart. Lincoln sometimes mouths his words. When he said: "If ever I get a chance to hit that thing, I'll hit it hard," the performance, at any rate, reeled under the blow. If he made a point by his pose, he unmade it by his voice. At the close of episode four, the tired man, merely as tired man, was natural and affecting; but two minutes later he was pronouncing the "dreams are made of" passage in a tone that abolished at a stroke all the difference between Abraham Lincoln and—let us say, a Harvard professor or an English archdeacon. Let me say more explicitly what I have already hinted—that his Lincoln in repose had a dignity and serenity, an eminent decency, which was not without its value and attraction.

The rest of the performance, though good in bits, was unsifted, undisciplined. The same taste that made Lincoln tumid added svagger to Grant. It is hard to imagine anything better fitted to make a death at once gaudy and shabby than the final episode in Ford's Theatre.

Teachers' Salaries in the Sixth Century

ONE of the advantages or disadvantages of a classical scholar is that he is forever reminding us that there is little or nothing new under the sun, and that situations in human society are constantly repeating themselves. How much benefit accrues from these reflections is very much a question. Certainly teachers and professors can not derive any too great satisfaction from the thought that they belong to a profession that from earliest times has not received adequate compensation; indeed, such a thought may be entirely disappointing, since blasphemers will say that if the world has for a thousand years or more been able to secure men and women who will teach at absurdly low salaries, it is probable that the world can get along in the future without worrying too much about the justice or even the expediency of proper compensation. Probably, in Ian Hay's phrase, the teacher's calling will be for many years to come "the most responsible, the least advertised, the worst paid, and the most richly rewarded profession in the world."

It is also probable that there will always be men in public life who see clearly the irony of the situation and who make strenuous efforts to improve it. If after all the college drives and publicity there are anywhere in the United States men who are still reactionaries on this point, I would commend to them the words of King Athalaric to the Senate of the City of Rome written shortly before his death, which took place October 2, A. D. 534. He begins his letter in a manner familiar to all those who have had reason to address Boards of Education, school committees, or college trustees: "You who are called Fathers should be interested in all that concerns the education of your sons." He then goes on to say what might be repeated to-day in New York or Boston: "We hear by certain whisperings that the teachers of eloquence at Rome are not receiving their proper reward." And this is followed naturally enough by praise of what the school accomplishes. (The common school is the bulwark of American institutions.) "Other nations have arms, the lords of the Romans alone have eloquence." Accordingly, the king lays it down that the senate should support with its full authority and with generosity the teacher of rhetoric and grammar "if he be found suitable for his work and obey the decrees of the Prefect of the city." (Were there Bolsheviks lying loose about the Forum, discontented by reason of poor pay, one asks?) Apparently in those days not only were teachers poorly compensated but they had also sometimes to wait for their pay. And so the king with fine insight writes: "The Grammarian is a man to whom every hour unemployed is misery and it is a shame that such a man should have to await the caprice of a public functionary before he gets his pay." But the most interesting parallel follows: we are reminded of "train the mind and mind the train" when we read further: "If we provide generously salaries for the play-actors who minister only to the amusement of the public, and take pains to pay these who are not really necessary, how much more should we look after those who are the moulders of the style and character of our youth!"

Athalaric concludes with the argument, now so familiar, that teachers cannot do their work if they have to worry too much about their salaries: "therefore let them not have to try the philosophical problem of thinking about two things at once; but with their minds at ease about their subsistence, devote themselves with all their might to the teaching of liberal arts."

This whole letter of Athalaric, grandson of Theodoric the Great, from which these extracts are taken is well worth the study of those who are advocating more pay for teachers; and we are grateful to Cassiodorus for preserving it for us. For if the grandson of a Goth could write so intelligently, have we a right to pride ourselves too much on our distance from the dark night of Gothic ignorance, if the same problems still confront us and if we are no less stupid in their solution?

Books and the News Russia

ALL hope of impartiality abandon, who enter upon this controverted subject. At least, all hope of recognizing which book is impartial, which is true, and which is special pleading. One set of critics will not grant writers upon the other side knowledge, sincerity, or even an ability to write English. Bad faith, the willingness to falsify original sources, are freely charged.

For a background, before entering upon the controversial books of the past two years, what book shall be read? Once, it was the custom to point to Sir Donald Wallace's "Russia" (Holt, 1905), but the modern reader will perhaps prefer the scholarly work of Charles R. Beazley and others, "Russia from the Varangians to the Bolsheviks" (Oxford, 1919). The work of a Russian writer is also indicated: Alexander Kornilov's "Modern Russian History from Catharine the Great to the Present" (2 vols. Knopf, 1916-17), of which the later chapters are by the translator. A book by the President of the Czechoslovak Republic, Thomas G. Masaryk, is especially valuable, "The Spirit of Russia: Studies in History, Literature and Philosophy" (2 vols. Macmillan).

E. H. Wilcox's "Russia's Ruin" (Scribner, 1919) appears to be free enough from bias to be praised by critics of both camps, and Professor E. A. Ross, who will not believe the worst of Lenin, has written a useful book in "Russia in Upheaval" (Century, 1918).

"Russian Revolution Aspects" (Dutton, 1919), by R. E. C. Long, is a good recital of events. Kerensky's "Prelude to Bolshevism" (Dodd, 1919) is tough reading, but it contains important material. I have not seen Mrs. Harold Williams's "History of the Russian Revolution" (Macmillan), and believe I am correct in saying that it is not yet published. From what I learn of the writer, and her opportunities for observation, the book should be added to the list.

Arthur Ransome, in "Russia in 1919" (Huebsch, 1919), favors the Soviet government, and writes, as almost everyone agrees, in an attractive style. Of John Reed's "Ten Days that Shook the World" (Boni, 1919), it is enough to say that readers with a tender spot in their hearts for Bolshevism like it well; and that Charles Edward Russell thinks that Reed loves a revolution as a boy loves the Fourth of July, for its big bangs.

Admirers of Mr. Trotsky and Mr. Lenin disapprove profoundly of John Spargo's "Bolshevism" (Harper, 1919), and they reject with pitying contempt, as "superficial," Ackerman's "Trailing the Bolsheviks" (Scribner, 1919), Stebbing's "From Czar to Bolsheviks" (Lane, 1919), and "Bolshevik Aims and Ideals" (Macmillan, 1919), whose author is not disclosed. I think that they shake their heads over "The Russian Pendulum" (Macmillan, 1919), by Arthur Bullard.
